An invention which is destined to revolutionize the work of threshing has been invented by A. A Booth, of Odell, a few miles north of Sanborn. It is a self-feeder and band cutter, and when in its perfected state it is claimed that it will do the work of five men, entirely doing away with the usual three feeders and two band-cutters.

A Sanborn dispatch says: Grain is so heavy in some fields that only half a swath can be cut with the harvesters. In former years only two and one-half pounds of twine on the average has been used to the acre, but the average this year is three and one-half pounds. In cutting nine acres of wheat one farmer used forty pounds of twine, showing that the stand of grain is immense.

Rev. S. N. Griffith of Larimore had a preliminary trial before Justice Cutts of Grand Forks, charged with assault with intent to outrage a girl aged nine years, daughter of Newell Morgan, a farmer of Arvilla. The alleged assault occurred during a camp meeting in June. The defense claimed the charge was the result of spite work on the part of parents of the child. Judge Cutts held the defendant to the district court in $1,000 bail. Rev. Griffith is pastor of the Methodist church at Larimore. He was lately elected professor of mathematics of the new Methodist university. There is considerable excitement here over the matter and some division of opinion as to his guilt.

News was received at Des Moines of a wreck which occurred on the Chicago, Kansas City & St. Paul road at Arispe. It was caused by a slide in an embankment which threw over nine freight cars, piling them up promiscuously. Brakeman W. H. Stickney was killed by being caught in the debris. He boarded in Des Moines, but his remains were taken to a town in Minnesota where his mother lives.

Over three hundred old settlers who have resided in Wapello county over forty years, met in their annual reunion on the fair grounds at the opening day of this fair about a characteristic log cabin. Rev. W. A. Nye and Hon. W. A. Worth were the operators. J. M. Peck was elected president for the ensuing year; R. H. Warden, vice-president and historian; John Ford, secretary.

The two men who were arrested at Algona about two weeks ago for swindling a farmer named David King out of $2,000, and who were subsequently released upon returning the money and paying heavy fines are noted Chicago bunko steerers and confidence men. An officer arrived in the city the other morning in search of the men, from Plattsburg, Mo., where they recently swindled a farmer out of $3,500. From photographs and samples of hand writing it was settled beyond a doubt that they were the men wanted.

A Metamorphosis and Its Results.

A man went to one of our livery stables and bought a pig that weighed about seventy-five pounds. He placed the animal into a bag and tied the end up, then left on a brief errand leaving the bagged pig. While he was absent, a well known wag took out the pig and put in a goat. Soon the man returned and lifting the bag into his wagon he drove to his home on Congress street. Arriving there he first unharnessed his horse, then he untied the bag. Out jumped the goat and with a pressure of seven tons to the inch he struck the astonished man in the stomach knocking him gasping under the stairs, where he lay, kicking out with one foot to keep the goat back until he regained his equilibrium. The goat then proceeded to butt the stuffing out of everything in the barn. Then he left the barn and went into the garden where early vegetables were just beginning to feel a little confidence, but which were soon trod out by the feet of the goat. The man by this time reached the scene, and armed with a cord wood stick tried to capture the goat. Over fields, through flower and vegetable gardens rushed the wild goat with a wilder man in pursuit. The animal was finally captured but not until he had laid waste nearly every garden on Congress street. The man offers one million dollars reward for the person who changed the pig into a goat.

A Precaution.

Two small boys on a Pennsylvania Avenue car were watching everything and talking, as small boys do, when the conductor's whistle attracted them.

"Get on to the whistle?" said one.

"Yep," said the other, "but whats he got it tied to a string for?"

This was a poser for a minute, and then the little one chirped: "I know what for; it's to keep hisself from swallerin' it."—Washington Star.

MANY BODIES FOUND

Searchers For the Victims of the New York Horror Continue Their Sad Work.

Their Labor's Well Rewarded, Thirty Five Bodies Having Been Recovered.

NEW YORK, Aug. 25.—The digging for the dead bodies in the ruins continued uninterruptedly all last night, except for the rain that fell at periods during the night.

At 3:25 in the morning there was a bustle of excitement among the workmen that soon spread to the eager watchers at the fire line. Another body had been found. It was that of a man, and lay beside the tangle of presses at No. 70. It was terribly burned and unrecognizable, unless identity may be disclosed by the tattered fragments of clothing that but partly covered it.

The work again went on unmarked by incident until 7:40 o'clock this morning, when a second body was found, also that of a man, near the spot where the first was discovered. Five minutes later a third body of a man was found in nearly the same place. Hardly had this been unearthed when the body of another man was found, but it lay beneath a heavy press and it will be impossible to remove it until a derrick is obtained to hoist the press from the ruins. Almost simultaneously came the discovery of a fifth body—making twenty-one in all—among the brick and paper at 74. It was that of a large man, but when the face became visible, it was like the others—unrecognizable. At 9 o'clock the Italian laborers were still at work removing the bricks that buried the body and hindered its removal. From daylight on the crowd of spectators at the fire lines gradually increased, and at 9 o'clock a densely packed throng filled every spot that commanded the slightest view of the blackened ruins.

NO BOILER IN THE BUILDING,

but the presses were not working when the accident occurred. It was due probably to the faulty construction of the building.

One of the bodies recovered this morning is believed to be that of John Steinke of Hoboken.

At 10:10 o'clock the body found at 8 o'clock pinned down beneath a press was removed. In order to release it, tackle employed in hoisting safes was secured and was fastened to a telegraph pole and the press raised sufficiently to permit of the recovery of the body. It was that of a young man about eighteen or twenty years old. About ten minutes later the body of another young man or boy was found almost directly beneath the platform, which latter had been removed. It had been identified as Ernest D. Shaddock of Brooklyn, who was employed by Leibier & Maas. He was sixteen years old.

Just before these two bodies were taken from the ruins a crowd of people standing on the steps of the building opposite the wreck saw one of the Italians working in the ruins stoop over the body of one of the victims and take something out of the vest pocket. They shouted to the police and a boy ran across the street and told Policeman Sweeney, of the Ninth precinct, who arrested the Italian. He was compelled to show what he had in his pockets, and the first thing he pulled out was a silver watch which he admitted he had "picked up." He was taken to the Second precinct station house, followed by a mob, many of whom shouted "Lynch him! Lynch him!" From the police station he was taken to the Tombs police court. There he gave his name as Rosso Savano. He said he intended to give the watch to his boss. He was held for trial.

SIX MORE BODIES

were found in the ruins at 3 o'clock. The work of the taking them out of the debris was completed at 3:25 o'clock, when it was learned that five of the bodies were those of women and girls and one that of a boy. One of the bodies was identified as Lottie Heim, twenty-five years old, who worked with Liebier & Mass. Another as that of Maggie Quinn, about twenty years old, and a third that of Mamie Williams, sixteen years old. The two first were press girls.

District Attorney Nicholl is considering the question of indicting the person or persons responsible for the disaster. After a long consultation with his chief assistant, ex-Sudge Redford, he placed the case in the hands of Assistant District Attorney Townsend.

The scenes at the morgue to-day were similar to those of yesterday. Up to 5 o'clock twenty-one bodies had been brought to the morgue from the scenes of the diaster. Of these thirteen at the morgue by friends or relatives. The bodies of those identified as soon as they were dug out of the debris were not taken to the morgue, but removed at once to undertakers' shops. Most of the identifications were made from the articles of clothing found on the charred remains.

Another body was removed from the ruins at 6:45 o'clock. It was that of a large and muscular man, about six feet in height and perhaps 185 pounds weight. The remains were not much burned, although somewhat blackened. There was no mutilation of any part, and the hair was not even singed. None of those at the scene of the disaster waiting the recovery of relations could identify these remains and they were sent to the morgue. This was the thirty-fifth body which had been recovered up to that hour.

Late this evening the workmen in removing some timbers revealed the arm, head and breast of a woman. She lay on her back, and a large press crushed her down with its weight, and rendered the removal of the body impossible without the use of a derrick. It was allowed to remain where found until to-morrow. A canvas was mercifully thrown over the face, which showed no sign of suffering, she probably having been providentially stunned before the huge press crushed out her life.

An alarm was sent out from police headquarters to-day for Louis Rosenfeld, proprietor of the paint store at No. 70 Park place. He has been missing since the disaster, and his brother thinks the fearful scenes he witnessed after the crash came unsettled his mind and that he is wandering aimlessly about this or some other city.

A BROTHER'S TRIBUTE.

An Eulogistic Memorial of the Late Prof Alex Winchell.

WASHINGTON, Special Telegram, Aug. 25.—At the annual meeting of the Geological Society of America to-day Prof. N. H. Winchell, who fills the chair of geology in the Minnesota state university, read a touching and eulogistic memorial of his dead brother, Prof. Alex Winchell, the last elected president of the society, who was well known in Minnesota.

The memorial was quite lengthy, and reviewed the dead geologist's life from his birth, Dec. 31, 1834, in Duchess county, N. Y., to his death at Ann Arbor Feb. 9 last. His work was many sided. He had studied to be a civil engineer; had a strong leaning toward theology. He also read medicine and was a fine mathematician. He loved music; wrote poetry, and modeled in clay and plaster. As a financial resource he became a teacher, and was very successful. He became famous by his arguments on "The Bible History of the Creation." He published in the Christian Advocate "Adamites and Pre-Adamites," a far-reaching exposition of Scriptural and scientific harmony. For four years he lectured on geology at Vanderbilt university. During his long connection with the university of Michigan he wrote many scientific articles of a popular nature, and did a great deal toward popularizing geology. The speaker spoke eloquently of his dead brother's long and splendid connection with the Ann Arbor university.

His death was most touchingly described. Oddly enough the last words he uttered in public were these: "When I speak to you again it will be of the inhabitants of another world." He had just finished his weekly lecture and referred in his closing sentence to the subsequent lecture that was never delivered. He was a most prolific writer. His sketches on "Creation" are a very widely read book, and many other works written in refutation of evolutionary ideas being very successful. He discovered many new geological species, and many other geologists testified their admiration for him by naming species they discovered after him. His great work for the geological society was touched on, and in closing the living brother said that the new generation keenly feel the beneficent influence of his work.

At the conclusion of the memorial Prof. Edward Orton, Dr. C. A. White and C. R. Vanhise were appointed a committee to draft resolutions expressive of the society's regret at the death of its president.

MOSBY ON HIS MUSCLE.

The Ex-Guerrilla Chieftain Whips an Insulting Street Car Conductor.

SAN FRANCISCO, Aug. 25.—Fur flew on a Leavenworth street car yesterday. A conductor collided with Col. John S. Mosby, the old guerrilla chieftain, and the colonel laid the conductor in remnants on the floor. Then the gripman tried to slay the colonel as he was shaking the prostrate remnants of the conductor. Then the ladies in car came to the old colonel's rescue and carpeted the dummy with the gripman's hair.

The colonel started out from his hotel for a quiet ride on the cable cars. Owing to the crowd Mosby was obliged to take an inside seat. Presently the inside began to fill up. A lady entered and looked around. Every seat was taken. The colonel gave her his seat. Having performed this courtesy the colonel looked around and noticed that some of the seats on the grip had become vacant. The afternoon was scorching hot and the colonel went outside.

"May I cross to the dummy?" he asked the gripman. "You can't, and you know it," said that official.

Hot words followed. The colonel knocked the conductor down and hammered him. The car was stopped and the gripman, a large, powerful man attacked Mosby. Three lady passengers assisted by pulling the gripman's hair. Squeals rent the air; the gripman got up and bolted; so did Col. Mosby; so did the battered conductor, and the latter chased out to seek the police. Afterward Col. Mosby said:

> Generally I try to stomach insults from men in that class, for I hate a row. But you see that Mitkiewicz affair has made me a bit irritable, and so I smashed the fellow.

Mosby bears a few marks of the encounter. His knees are peeled and his thumb is scratched. The conductor, however, has a face that is unfit for publication.

NEARLY THREE MILLIONS.

The Wheat Acreage of North Dakota by Counties.

BISMARCK, N. D., Special Telegram, Aug. 25.—Complete assessors' returns from all but one county in North Dakota give the following acreage of wheat by counties:

County.	Acreage.	County.	Acreage.
Barnes	137,421	Morton	11,440
Benson	84,839	Nelson	57,760
Billings	....	Oliver	644
Bottineau	36,880	Pembina	218,066
Burleigh	17,283	Pierce	9,874
Cass	527,070	Ramsey	70,508
Cavalier	67,108	Ransom	70,703
Dickey	107,816	Richland	156,631
Eddy, est'd	25,000	Rolette	21,656
Emmons	15,872	Sargent	99,320
Foster	24,957	Stark	7,109
Frand Forks.	262,990	Steele	82,102
Griggs	39,040	Stutsman	57,407
Kidder	25,107	Towner	38,448
La Moure	56,670	Traill	269,426
Logan	4,744	Walsh	241,673
McHenry	6,910	Ward	844
McIntosh	32,681	Wells	21,821
McLean	4,338
Mercer	2,137	Total	2,907,415

These figures are official, but it is probable that they understate the acreage somewhat, for the auditors' of some counties state that the assessors' reports were incomplete. But the total acreage will not vary much from the figures given. The total is an increase of 630,536 acres over the acreage of last year.

A Crack Country Club.

CUMBERLAND, Wis., Special Telegram, Aug. 25.—The Cumberland Base Ball club returned from Eau Claire this morning covered with glory. They won from the Eau Claires Saturday and Sunday in hotly contested games, the scores standing 2 to 4 and 10 to 6. The games were played at Eau Claire, where several thousands dollars changed hands. Cumberland now boosts of the banner nine in the state outside of league clubs.

Stolen Property Identified.

RED WING, Minn., Special, Aug. 25.—The stolen property found in the possession of the Diamond Bluff burglar has been identified as the property of Stockholm and Martin Rock, parties from whom it was stolen on Monday night.

Gamble's Successor.

HURON, S. D., Special Telegram, Aug. 25.—It is stated on good authority that Bartlett Tripp will not permit his name to be used as a candidate for congress. If this is true, Gen. Taylor, candidate for governor on the Democratic ticket last fall, will be urged to make the run for congress. Hon. P. M. McClure is also mentioned as a possible candidate and has many friends to back him. H. L. Loucks of the Farmers' Alliance and representing the Independents says he is not prepared to say what his party will do, but when the proper time comes they will be in the field.

JOHN WALTON'S FARM.

New York Ledger.

"Hadn't you better subscribe for it?"

"I tell you, no. I haven't the money to spare. And, if I had, I haven't got the time to waste over newspapers," said Eben Sawyer, with some emphasis.

"But you will gain much information from it in the course of a year, sir," pursued John Walton.

"I tell you, I don't want it!"

This was spoken so flatly and bluntly that Walton said no more, but folded up the prospectus of a periodical which he had with him and then turned away.

Eben Sawyer and Ben. Grummet were two old farmers—that is, old at the business, though they had only reached the middle age of life—and after their young neighbor had gone they expressed their opinions concerning him.

"He'll never make a farmer," said Sawyer, with a shake of his head. "He spends too much time over those papers and books of his. He's a leetle mite above farmin', in my opinion."

"Those are my sentiments," responded Grummet. "I tell you, Eben, the man that thinks to make a livin' on a farm in this section has got to work for it."

At this juncture Sam Bancroft came along. He was another old native of the district.

"We was just talkin' about young Walton," said Sawyer.

"He's rippin' his barn-floor up," said Bancroft.

"Rippin' the floor up!" repeated Grummet. "Why, the whole floor was put down new only three years' ago."

"The tie-up floor, I mean," pursued Bancroft. "He's got a carpenter up from the village; and his two hired men are helpin'."

"Whew! I guess he'll make a farmer!"

And so they all guessed—with a reservation. In short, there was something highly ridiculous in the thought of a man's thinking to be a farmer and a student at the same time.

John Walton was a young man, and though he had been born in the neighborhood, yet much of his life had been spent in other sections of the country. His parents having both died, John had married, and now turned his thoughts to making a living out of the old homestead.

Ben. Grummet had a curiosity to see what was going on in Walton's barn, so he dropped in there. He found that the whole of the floor, where the cattle stood, had been torn up, and that they were digging a wide, deep trench the whole length of the tie-up.

"What on airth is all this for?" asked Ben.

"Why," returned Walton, who was busy superintending the work and also in working himself, "I am having a place fixed here for making manure. I mean to fill this trench up with good muck and thus save the liquids which have heretofore been lost. I think, by proper management I can get double the quantity of manure which others have got on this place."

"Do ye?" said Grummet, sarcastically.

"Yes," resumed the young man. "It is a fact that the liquid manures, could they be saved, would fully equal the solids both in bulk and value, and when combined with well rotted muck, and some other articles which shall take up and retain all the more volatile parts, I feel sure that they will afford more fertilizing powers and properties than the solid manures can."

"You don't say so! Where d'ye larn all that?"

"Partly from reading and partly from observation," answered John, smiling at his good neighbor's sarcasm.

"I don't suppose it costs anything to do all this?"

"Oh yes; it will cost me considerable before I get through."

"Yaas; I should rayther calkilate it would."

"I swan!" Ben Grummet cried, as he met Sawyer shortly afterwards. "John Walton's reg'lar hifalutin. He's jes' about as nigh to bein crazy as a man can be."

"Eh?—crazy, Ben?"

"O—I don't mean, railly upsot, like folks who are sent to the insane asylum; but he's got his head of all sorts of nonsense."

"But what in nature's he goin' to do?"

"Why—he's goin' to save the liquids, as he calls 'em! An' he's goin' to put in somethin' to take up the vol—voluntary parts."

"Voluntary parts? What are they, Ben?"

"It was vol somethin'. But I don't know. I wouldn't ask him. Is'pose he jest used the outlandish word so's to get me to ask him what it meant—an' then he'd show off his larnin'. But I wa'n't so green."

"I wonder if he thinks he's a comin' here to show ns old farmers how to work?" said Sawyer, rather indignantly.

"I guess he thinks so," returned Grummet.

"Then I guess he'll find out his mistake," added the other. 'Jes' you mark my words, Ben. He'll be flat on his back afore two years is out!"

Autumn came, and after John Walton had mowed over a twenty-acre field, getting hardly hay enough to pay for the labor, he set men at work digging deep trenches all over it. He had two dug lengthwise, running up and down the slope; and then he dug quite a number running across these. They were quite deep and broad, and into them he tumbled nearly all the stones that could be found in the fields.

"A pooty expensive way of gettin' rid o' rocks," remarked Grummet.

"It's a better place for them than on the surface, isn't it?" returned Walton, with a smile.

"Mebbe. But what on airth are ye doin' it for?"

"Why—I'm going to see if under-draining won't improve the land."

"Under-draining! What's that?"

"It is simply drawing off the water from the surface. This land is cold and wet; but these rocks the sun may warm the surface and give me a good piece of soil here."

But it looked very foolish to Ben. Grummet. He believed that "what was the natur of the soil couldn't be altered." However, the young man made trenches—tumbled in the rocks—filled in on top with the loam he had originally removed, and then left it to work for itself for a while. A month later he plowed up two acres of it and he could see that the soil had already changed wonderfully. After this was done he cut his way to the muck-swamp and went to hauling out that article, which he deposited in various places, as he deemed proper.

"That's a cur'us contrivance," said Sam. Bancroft. He and Ben. Grummet had been at work for Walton at hauling muck. He alluded to a large vat back of the house, into which ran a spout from the sink. This vat was capable of holding several cartloads of stuff, and was already half full.

"That's a compost vat," exclaimed Walton, who had overheard the remark. "All the slops from the house—the soap-suds and such stuff—which most people wasted, I save by this means, and turn it to good account; and instead of throwing away refuse matter I put it in here and let it rot and ferment, and make manure."

"That all sounds very pooty," remarked Ben., after Walton had left them; "but let me jes' tell you, it don't pay! He'd better let sich fandangles alone if he ever expects to make a livin' at farmin.' "

Before the ground froze up Walton threw out most of the muck back of his tie-up, which had become well saturated, and filled the trench up anew. When spring came Walton went to some of his neighbors and asked them to go in with him and send for some good scions to engraft upon their apple trees. He explained to them just the plan he had formed for his own orchard.

"How much will it cost you?" asked Sawyer?

"Why," returned Walton, "I'm going into it thoroughly. My orchard is a large one, as yours is; and the trees are mostly thrifty and vigorous—or could be made so—but with poor fruit. I mean to make a thorough thing of it, and shall expend a hundred dollars this spring."

"What! A hundred dollars! In your orchard?"

"Yes."

"Jewhitaker an' broomsticks! When I git money to play with, I'll try it."

A little while later, and the grass began to spring up on the twenty-acre lot as it had never sprung up before; and as time went on John Walton was continually studying how to improve his farm.

"Good gracious!" ejaculated Eben Sawyer, as Ben. Grummet and Sam. Bancroft came into his house one cool autumn evening, "have you heard about John Walton's apples?"

"Yes," returned Ben. "I was there, and heerd the whole on't—so I know—I never would 'ave thought it. An orchard turn out like that!"

"And jes' look at that twenty-acre field," said Bancroft. "Five years ago it wouldn't hardly pay for the mowin' It didn't bear much else but podgum. Now look at it. Think of the corn an' wheat he's raised there; an' this year he cut more'n forty tons of good hay from it!"

"We was jest talkin' about you, Mr. Walton," said Sawyer one day as John came into his house.

"Ah," returned John as he took a seat by the fire. "I hope you found nothing bad to say of me."

"Not a bit of it. We was talkin' about the wonderful improvement you've made on the old place and of the money you make."

"And do you think it wonderful?"

"But ain't it?"

"Well," replied Walton; "I don't know about that; but I'll tell you what I do know: I know there is no class of people in the world who may read and study to better advantage than farmers. Farming is a science, and he must be a man of more than ordinary capacity who can master it all. In short, there is no branch of industry in the world which may not be followed to better advantage without a good education. But farmers must not be afraid of newspapers and books. They won't if they are wise, follow every advice which experimentalists give, but they may study and reason and experiment for themselves. So I have done and so I mean to do."

A Cataract.

Byron in one of his poems describes a beautiful spray-like cataract in Switzerland, and compares it to a horse's tail, which rather deprived the lines of real poetry; and Goethe attempted to give a description of a cataract, but Lowell says he never knew any one but Milton who got any poetry out of a cataract, and that has a cataract on his eye.

TALK ABOUT THE FARM.

VALUABLE INFORMATION FOR THE FARMER.

Pasturing or Clipping Clover--Advantages of Sheep on the Farm --Wide or Narrow Tires-- For Increasing Polled Cattle.

Pasturing or Clipping Clover.

Examination of the clover plant will disclose the fact that the crown forms just at the surface of the ground. It is well known also that clover, although a vigorous grower, is a very tender plant. Taking account of these two facts, a writer for the Practical Farmer comes to the conclusion that the greatest injury to clover comes from trampling by cattle pastured on it. Consider, he says, the effect of placing from four hundred to one thousand pounds weight on this tender crown; it is not surprising that the plant is injured. Another objection is that cattle will not graze regularly over the entire ground, but where the clover is thinnest and needs most care to help it do its best there the stock graze the closest.

Stock in grazing do not bite off all the stems coming from one crown at one time. Some will be left to continue a spindling growth, and a plant so treated will not stool and form that thick, even growth necessary for a large crop the following year. This writer has found by experience that to clip clover and leave it on the ground as mulch is worth more than all the pasture which can be got from newly seeded clover; and this is true whether the field is to be mowed for hay or pastured. It pays to keep stock off the young clover.

And yet it is an almost universal practice among farmers to turn stock into new seeded fields as soon as the wheat or oats are taken off, pasturing the clover off close to the ground, leaving the tender crown and roots exposed to hot sun and dry winds for the rest of the summer and fall, and to the tender mercies of the elements during winter. If we intend to cut a crop of clover-seed for hay, by clipping our clover the first year, instead of pasturing it off, our clover is ready to cut for hay from ten days to two weeks earlier, and all who have experience in growing clover seed know that the earlier the hay is cut the better the crop of seed. It is probable that in localities where it is impossible to raise clover seed on the account of the clover midge, if the clover was clipped back, and everything left on the ground for a mulch to stimulate a rapid and early growth, so as to cut the hay early before the first crop of insects hatched, the seed would bloom and be too for advanced for them to injure it.

The difference in the yield of clover when clipping instead of pasturing is practiced is so great—often as half a ton of poor quality to three tons of fine hay to the acre—that it is surprising that farmers so seldom adopt it. And then the fertilizing value of a heavy growth of clover is a matter of the highest moment to the farmer—a matter that he cannot afford to ignore in these days of sharp competition and small profits in agricultural products.

Advantages of Sheep on the Farm.

Observation and experience clearly show that sheep are of inestimable value in restoring and maintaining the fertility of the farm. In clearing and renovating old fields the value of the flock cannot be overstated, and there are many poor, briery, bushy farms in the country whose value could be greatly enhanced by letting sheep roam over the fields.

Discussing this topic in the Indiana Farmer, Mr. C. P. Smith says that, while sheep are of great value in keeping down the briers, bushes and weeds, the chief object of keeping them is the production of wool and mutton, although some farmers may be induced to keep a few sheep for the good which they do to their soil and lands.

With regard to the proper feeding of sheep during the summer he says that an important point is the relative proportion of water in the food required to get the best advantage. This is a subject that many flock-masters fail to think about. A good fattening fodder must not be too watery, and large quantities of brewer's or distiller's grains, or even of roots, are of far less benefit to these animals than to cattle. Feeding too heavily upon roots is not beneficial, for they are very watery although the English turnip plays an important part in the founder of the English system. In this country, however, the roots have not yet been fed in sufficient quantity to do any harm, but on the contrary, they have not been fed to sheep enough.

Potatoes allow a pretty fair ratio between water and total dry matter, and they should be fed along with grains grass and hay. Sheep are rather particular in their food and they will not eat anything distasteful to them until forced to it by hunger. But with a little judicious care the odds and ends on the farm can be fed to them in such a way as to make a good cheap fodder, if there is an abundance of small potatoes or roots to give to them do not feed them too liberally to the exclusion of grass, hay and grain, but feed them out gradually along with the other fodder. In this way the flock will be made to do better and many odds and ends will be eaten up that must gather on every farm.

Wide or Narrow Tires?

A Wisconsin farmer recently had occasion to dig a ditch through a meadow, and while doing so his attention was attracted by the tracks made by a narrow-tired and a wide-tired wagon respectively. The ditch crossed both tracks, so that the impression made on the soil by each was clearly revealed. The narrow tires cut completely through the sod, leaving two deep ruts, while the wide tires simply depressed the surface a little, but did not cut through the sod and therefore did little if any damage. The weight of the loads were about the same.

He discovered another thing, also, which has often been observed before. At the time of hauling he took no special notice of any difference in the pulling, but learned afterward from his man that the team which was attached to the narrow-tired wagon was much more weary every night than the one that hauled the wide-tired wagon, all though both teams are quite equally matched. These discoveries have led him to believe that a narrow-tired wagon for farm use is a downright detriment to any farmer.

The only condition under which a wide-tired farm wagon is undesirable is where the roads are of a clayey character, and have been reduced by rains and the use of narrow tires to a tenacious mud of the consistency of thick hasty pudding, into which even the broad tires will sink to the hubs. Such roads would make hard traveling with a broad-tired vehicle. But the time will come when farming communities will see it for their interest to abolish such roads, and by combined efforts secure solid, well drained highways, which will be improved by every wide-tired wheel that passes over them.

For Increasing Polled Cattle.

An association has been formed in Indiana for the purpose of advancing the breeding of polled cattle of all varieties, without essentially modifying the characteristics of the breed operated upon. The transformation is to be effected, not by mutilation, but by breeding of the horns. This can be done, as experience has demonstrated, in a few years' time, so that the polled character will be fixed in the breed, while leaving the other traits of the animal intact. Thus there will be herds of polled Shorthorns, Hereford's, Jersey, etc., equal in their special qualities to their horned ancestors.

The accomplishing of this object is much to be desired. Dehorning with instruments should be regarded as only a temporary expedient to insure the present safety of man and beast. What is wanted is breeds from which the horns have been removed forever, These weapons of offense and defense are too much like the ruffian's pistol, ready for use on the slightest provocation. Cattle are much more gentle and tractable without than with them. It is true that a powerful bull without horns may still do mischief with his massive head, but the polled beast is a good deal less likely to show ugly temper than a horned animal, and is more easily managed when aroused.

Raising Lambs for the Butchers.

Some forethought is necessary in all farming transactions, as well as in mercantile and other pursuits. To make the most of lambs for the butchers, select a lot of Merino or common ewes during the latter part of summer and procure a good healthy ram of either Southdown or Cotswold—full-blooded, not a grade—for coupling with them, so as to have lambs dropped from the middle of February to the middle of March. A two-year old ram is much better than a yearling, and will get strong and healthy lambs. From twenty ewes well taken care of, thirty lambs, at least, may be expected, and will be fit for the butcher during the month of May. The ewes may then be fed off on good pasture and sold to the butcher in August, in time to bring in a new lot for the next year's operation. Sheep will be more healthy and do better on upland. Low, marshy land is not suitable for this branch of business; it is not congenial to the constitution and habits of the animal.

Many a small farmer might turn a little capital to good advantage in this way, that is entirely neglected, for want of a little forethought. Well, there may be one other thing in the way—prejudice. It is hard to get some people out of the well-beaten track of their forefathers, even after they have been made to see that "the world moves." They say "my father made money on this farm by raising grain, and why can not I do it?"—Practical Farmer.

Thoughts to Remember.

In feeding linseed meal to calves, pour boiling water on it and let it stand until it jellies. Then pour more hot water on to thin it and mix it with skimmed milk. The linseed meal takes the place of the cream and is just as good for the calf; and better for the calf's owner because much cheaper. When a calf gets the scours it does not look bright. Nor does it show much brightness on the part of the feeder. Nine times in ten the scours is the feeder's fault. And, generally the tenth time too. There are many remedies for the scours, some very simple, some very complicated. The best one is to let the calf alone for a while. Skip one meal or two, then feed very lightly the next. And so work up to a full feed again, but be careful not to over-feed. Too rapid increase in feed is one of the chief causes of scours in calves.—National Stockman.

YOU WANT

a San Francisco paper and of course you want a good one. The WEEKLY EXAMINER fills the want completely, for it is the best. It gives you every week not only all the news, but the best literary and miscellaneous matter published on the American continent—that is its specialty; being the best. It wants your subscription—yours particularly—and offers not only to you, but to every other subscriber, one or more attractive premiums.

In the first place, it gives every subscriber, one of the four magnificent etchings or paintings described below, and delivers it safely at his address, postage paid.

"The Retreat from Moscow," by Meissonier,
"The Roman Chariot Race," by A. Wagner.

Each of these pictures is 21x28 inches, and they are elegantly reproduced in fac simile, showing every tint and color of the great originals, either one of which could not be purchased for $100,000.

"Women and Children First," by C. Napier Hemy,
"Christ Leaving the Prætorium," by Gustave Doré.

Each of these pictures is reproduced in photogravure, size 21x28, and eminently fitted for framing, and will adorn the walls of the most refined house.

Each subscriber has the choice of any one of these four pictures, which will be mailed him in a tube direct from the EXAMINER office, as soon as the subscription is received.

In the second place, it will give 5,000 premiums, valued in the aggregate at about $125,000 to its subscribers this year. If there are 50,000 subscribers, one in ten will get one of these premiums; if there are 100,000, only one in twenty. But no matter how many there are, each and every one of these premiums—which range in value from 50 cents to $6,000—will be given absolutely without cost to some of those who have paid $1.50 for the WEEKLY EXAMINER for one year. The EXAMINER is thoroughly responsible, as you know, or as Wells, Fargo & Co. or any bank or commercial agency in San Francisco will assure you, and the leading men of the city will see that its premiums are distributed exactly as agreed and that every subscriber no matter where he is located, will receive just what is assigned to him.

Of course you want your home paper also, and you can just as well as not save a little money by taking the EXAMINER with it. The price of the WEEKLY EXAMINER is $1.50 per year, including the premium picture and your share of the $125,000 list of premiums, which are fully described in the twelve page Premium Supplement, which will be sent free on application to Improved Passenger Service.

Under the new time schedule of "the North Western Line," C., St. P., M. & O. Ry., all passenger trains of this line make the distance between St. Paul and Chicago in less than 14 hours.

The Pullman and Wagner Vestibuled Limited, leaving St. Paul at 7:30 p. m. makes the trip to Chicago in 12½ hours and from Chicago to St. Paul in 13 hours and 25 minutes.

The Daylight Express leaving St Paul at 7:45 a. m. makes the trip to Chicago in 13 hours and 50 minutes and from Chicago to St. Paul in 13 hours and 45 minutes.

This is the only line running all its trains in less than 14 hour between St. Paul and Chicago, and while this time is quick trains don't have to run at as high speed to make their time as on other lines, because this is shorter than any other line.

In addition to these facts this is the only line by which connections are assure in Chicago with all fast line trains from Chicago to the East and South in the morning and at night.

Note.—Fares by this line are always as low as by any other.

Caution!—There have recently been issued several cheap reprints of the 1847 edition of Webster's Unabridged Dictionary, an edition long since superannuated. These books are given various names,—"Webster's Unabridged," "The Great Webster's Dictionary," "Webster's Big Dictionary," "Webster's Encyclopedic Dictionary," etc., etc.

Many announcements concerning them are very misleading, as the body of each, from A to Z, is 44 years old, and printed from cheap plates made by photographing the old pages.

Happily Wedded.

Our popular townsman and pastor of the Presbyterian church has taken to himself a wife, and the Galesburg Daily Mail of August 21, has a long account of the happy event, portions of which we reproduce:

An event took place last night of great interest to Knox college people and especially to the class of '88. There was a pretty romance in this class and it found its consummation last night in the marriage of Rev. Jirah S. McCornack and Miss Margaret M. Colville. The happy event took place at the residence of the bride's parents, Mr. and Mrs. George W. Colville, upon Monmouth boulevard. The house had been transformed by skillful fingers into a perfect bower for the event. Flowers filled every nook and corner, their sweet incense burdening the atmosphere. A company of about ninety, combrising the relatives, classmates and intimate friends of the bride and groom were assembled to witness the ceremony.

In the back parlor there had been arranged upon one side a bank of yellow helianthus, reaching from the ceiling to the floor. Before this the bridal couple took their places between the bridesmaid and groomsman, and Dr. Sturtevant, in that impressive manner so peculiarly his own, pronounced those solemn words which made them forever man and wife. * * Supper over the bride slipped away to change her wedding gown for a tasty traveling dress, after which the newly married couple entered their carriage and were driven to the "Q" depot in time for the 10:20 train, followed by the adieus, congratulations and showers of rice from the company. Rev. and Mr. McCornack proceed to Red Lake Falls, Minn, where the groom has a pastorate, stopping by the way at the various points of interest. They are the recipients of the sincere good wishes of their many friends and also of more substantial expressions in the form of many beautiful and useful gifts.

The bride is a charming and cultured young lady, the centre of a large circle of friends, enthusiastic in her church work and one whom Galesburg is sorry to lose. She was graduated from both the High school and Knox college, in both cases with thr highest honors. She was a member of the Knox class of '88 of which the groom was also a member, their acquaintance dating back over their entire college life. Rev. McCornack is also a graduate of McCormick Theological seminary, Chicago, and is now located at Red Lake Falls, Minn., which will be the future home of himself and wife.

The bridal couple arrived here Thursday evening last. They have gone to housekeeping on south Hamilton av. The NEWS extends congratulations and best wishes.

Highway Robbery.

A Citizen Accosted by Two Masked Men and Relieved of His Valuables,

The Robbers Escape and no Clue is Found as to Who They Are.

Our citizens were startled last night by the report of robbery committed upon the open street, at the early hour of 9:30 o'clock. Such an event has never before transpired here. The particulars as given to the NEWS by Mr. Schenecker, the victim, are as follows: He was leisurely sauntering along on 8th street hill and had arrived at about opposite John Rodgers' residence, when he was confronted by the robbers, who sprung from the darkness simultaneously, one of the men saying, at the same time, in a hoarse whisper, "Throw up your hands!" and covering him with two revolvers. Not being armed and seeing no alternative, he complied, throwing up both hands. One man covered him with the weapon while the other hurriedly rifled his pockets taking $250 in cash and a valuable watch and chain. This operation completed, they gave him a polite adieu, in the shape of a kick, and fled to the woods east of town. Mr. Schenecker immediately hunted up the marshal, but of course no trace of the men could be found. All the hotels in the city were visited but no information could be obtained that might serve as a clue to the identity of the men. It is a profound mystery who the robbers were, and how they obtained information that Mr. S. was in possession of the money. That day he had received a payment of $100 from Mr. O. Noel, and had drawn $100 from the bank; but no outsider was present at either of these transactions. It is pretty hard on Mr. Schenecker, and should serve to promote discretion in handling large sums of money,

Above is the program rendered last night at opera hall. A large audience was present and listened courteously to the different numbers. Mr. Dugan, baritone, sung two selections not on the program. Mr. Dugan's efforts were well received, and proved his voice a cultivated one. Mrs. Falardeau's solos were exquisite. The zyther and guitar music by Garceau and Zaiser was also a pleasant feature. The quartette, Moonlight Will come Again, by Mesdames Falardeau and Marshall, Messrs. Zaiser and Kaufer was encored. Mrs. Falardeau's soprano is always fine; Mrs. Marshall's alto was superb, and well sustained. As to the gentlemen—comment is unnecessary.

INJURED INNOCENCE.

The Polk County Journal and other papers published under the heading of "A Campaign Lie Nailed," statements intended as an argument tending to dispel the mist of boodleism still hovering over the Crookston Bond Gang. Tall and vigorous blowing has been brought to bear on the aforesaid mist since the recent fiasco, but to no avail; it still clings to the B. G.

It appears that in an unguarded moment, whilst argueing with a friend of the Duluth and Dakota Ry., our county treasurer unwittingly mentioned that the current talk was that the Crookston schemers were to divide $70,000 amongst themselves should the bond proposition carry. That was a mistake, he shouldn't have stated the amount.

After the Waterloo of Aug. 20, the gentlemen of the proposition felt sore, bruished, mad, but not ashamed. Oh no! not ashamed. A review of the campaign ground reveals a pitiful sight—gas baloons exploded, great expectations unrealized, weeks of labor wasted, grandeur and prestige to some and wealth to others unattained, Grand Mass Meetings speeches to an audience of One wasted, Polk county press comments in abundance, the heretofore bulldozable farmer not there. Nothing left but sweet revenge. But where, on whom shall we pour our wrath? The public is some thing too intangible, the county press teeming with suggestions of boodle and schemes, with accusations of trying to boodle the farmer out of their homes must not be molested; we are afraid of it; but happy thought! let us collect the immaculate amongst us willing to acknowledge ourselves offended by a general accusation of scheming in Crookston, and let us valiently proceed in a body to the county treasurer's office and use our innocent bulldozing apparatus vigorously. Let us make a united and grand kick with our last leg even at the risk of breaking it. This farmer Beaudry has slighted us in saying that the Crookston schemers were to divide boodle among themselves. He has championed the cause of his friend the farmer. He is of a nervous and retiring disposition and not versed in law—he is our game. With characteristic chivalry we will, eight of us, without notice, pounce upon him and do him up. So, on August 24, a menagerie comprising two cashiers of Crookston banks, an ex-treasurer, a Giant Attorney and a Boss Mayor filed in the office of the county treasurer, and Mr. attorney, the spokesman of the party, at once opened up in sweet, thundering tones. Threats of libel suits were hurled at him, clenched fists thrust in his face, terrific yelling, deskpounding, etc., served to carry their point and wrench from Mr. Beaudry a written statement as published, but not under oath as falsely represented.

Of course, Mr. Beaudry does not deny being personally cognizant of an understanding to rob the county—such things are hard to prove. Yet the county in general seems to be pretty much of one mind on this subject.

The campaign lie, if it is a lie, has served a purpose, none can deny.

LAMBERT, August 30, 1891.—Thanks for the copy of your paper. I am pleased to favor the NEWS with a few items this week.

A little girl of Mr. Stevenson, living north of the river, died of whooping cough after an illness of three days. Mrs. Stevenson was alone with the child when it died, her husband being at work in Dakota. The little girl was seven years old and much beloved. Our sympathies to the family.

One of North America's Great Me:

Three-fourths or more of Sir John Macdonald's political career has been sp in office. His success is due to no mere cleverness or tact or personal magnetism, though he possesses all these qualities in extraordinary degree. In grasp of principles and perfection of practice he surpasses most British statesmen. He is an omniverous reader, and the first destination of all the new books received at the Parliamentary library at Ottawa is at his house, Stadacona hall. The adroitness, therefore, with which he shapes his policy to the needs of the hour is not wholly due to inspiration; it is a result of vast knowledge and profound experience.

The fascination he exerts on all with whom he comes in contact is remarkable. One in a rage will go to him determined "to have it out with John A." He is received by a man of striking presence and easy, chivalrous manner, who begins by talking of the weather, digresses and discourses, tells an anecdote for two, and by and by conducts his visitor to the door —the object of his visit not so much as mooted. In the art of charming away hostile or inconvenient deputations he is unmatched. It is seldom indeed that such amiability and charm, such an airy veil of "sweetness and light," have concealed so great strength and decision of character. —National Observer.

Burr's Self Control.

Aaron Burr was by nature and training a man of extraordinary self control. He allowed no circumstance to throw him off his balance. An anecdote told by Rufus Choate to the late Richard H. Dana, recorded in Mr. Dana's "Diary," illustrates the callousness which aided Burr so greatly in controlling himself. Several years after the death of Hamilton—killed by Burr in a duel—Burr visited Boston, and Mr. Devereux, of Salem, paid him some attentions. The visitor was taken to the Boston athenæum, where, while the two men were walking through the gallery of sculpture, Mr. Devereux happened to catch sight of a bust of Hamilton.

The thought flashed across his mind that Burr might not care to be confronted with the sight of the features of the man he had slain. But no; Burr was undisturbed. He also espied the bust, and although Mr. Devereux had instictively turned away he walked up to it and said in a loud tone: "Ah! Here is Hamilton!" Then passing his fingers along certain lines of the face he added, "There was the poetry!" Hamilton's contemporaries gave him credit for possessing a poetic mind.

Stories of Swift.

I only know one good humored anecdote of Swift. It is very slight, but it is fair to tell it. He dined one day in the company of the lord keeper, his son and their two ladies, with Mr. Cæsar, treasurer of the navy, at his house in the city. They happened to talk of Brutus, and Swift said something in his praise, and then, as it were, recollecting himself, said, "Mr. Cæsar, I beg your pardon." One can fancy this occasioning a pleasant ripple of laughter.

There is another story I cannot lay my hands on to verify, but it is to this effect: Falkner, Swift's Dublin publisher, some years after the dean's death, was dining with some friends, who rallied him upon his odd way of eating some dish—I think asparagus. He confessed Swift had told him it was the right way, therefore they laughed the louder, until Faulkner, growing a little angry, exclaimed, "I tell you what it is, gentlemen, if you had ever dined with the dean, you would have eaten your asparagus as he bade you."—Speaker.

Treatment for Gas Poisoning.

Loosen the clothing at the neck.

Slap the face and chest with the wet end of a towel.

Apply warmth and friction if the body or limbs are cold.

Take the man at once into the fresh air. Don't crowd around him.

Keep him on his back. Don't raise his head or turn him on his side.

If the breathing is feeble or irregular artificial respiration should be used and kept up until there is no doubt that it can no longer be of use.

Give the ammonia mixture (one part in all, aromatic ammonia, to sixteen parts of water) in small quantities at short intervals, a teaspoonful every two or three minutes.—Hall's Journal of Health.

In China soapstone is largely used in preserving structures built of sandstone and other stones liable to crumble from the effect of the atmosphere; and the covering with powered soapstone in the form of paint on some of the obelisks in that country, composed of stone liable to atmospheric deteriortion, has been the means of preserving them intact for hundreds of years.

The number thirteen is supposed by many to be unlucky, and if they find themselves one of a party of that number they will depart with haste. But why should not the number thirteen be just as lucky as twelve, fourteen or any other number? Many instances could be cited to establish this principle were it necessary.

Some of the Icelandic lakes are studded with volcanic isles, miniature quiescent strombolis, whose craters rise from bases green with a prolific growth of angelica and grasses. Even in the bosom of the sea, off the coast, there are hidden volcanoes.

Society is one of the highest wants of the healthy mind. But a society of silence, or in which human intercourse was carried on by signs, were indeed, for us, scarcely society at all. Therefore conversation is involved in the very idea of society.

Not long ago exhibitions were given in London by two marvellously strong men, one of whom carried a cannon weighing 400 pounds on his shoulder, and the other lifted his companion, who weighed 376 pounds, high above his head.

Senator Sanders, of Montana, says that it is inconvenient for him to sleep in a sleeping car, for the reason that he is too long for the berths. His feet stick out at the end of the berth, to his great discomfort.

THE national debt of Germany, which is much smaller than that of any other great country in the world, is, in round figures, £39,000,000.

KAISER WILHELM is growing a bright, red beard which is said to be very becoming to his style of beauty. With his new whiskers and his new crown he will be jolly swell this winter.

THE report circulated by English newspapers that tourists are not permitted to use cameras in Russia is pronounced false. There is nothing dangerous to the Russian government in the "snap shot" of the kodak, and Nihilists therefore do not use them.

THE hungry German army, deprived of Russian rye, has taken to wheat bread, which calls to mind the story of the boy who thought that were a bread famine to come, he could subsist very comfortably on pie and cake for awhile.

A STORY comes from Montana of a woman who has been struck by lightning and not injured in the least. Moreover, the bolt presented her with a photograph for nothing—a photograph of the branch of a tree traced on her arm.

A RECENT outbreak of small-pox in Aarhus, Denmark, went unheeded by the local physicians, who failed to recognize the true character of the disease until three persons lay desperately ill, one in a resturant, where a lot of soldiers from the garrison ate their meals.

AN English visitor in Switzerland has been slapped in the face for ridiculing the William Tell tradition, and the general verdict is that he was served right. He had no business to go to Switzerland and talk that way. Those who try to spoil good stories anywhere are in bad business.

THE Chinese still have squint-eyed ways of viewing matters and things. The consul of that country in New York says China is a country which abhors war and cultivates the arts of peace, and when she sees all the foreign ships now on her coast she has reason to feel proud that it requires all the powers of the earth to whip her.

THE ancient Finns believed that a mystic bird laid an egg on the lap of Vaimainou, who hatched it in his bosom. He let it fall into the water and it broke, the lower portion of the shell forming the earth, the upper the sky; the liquid white became the sun and the yelk the moon, while the little fragments of broken shell were transformed into stars.

DURING the first year of his presidency Gen. Washington made a tour through a part of the New England states, going as far a Portsmouth, N. H. He traveled in a carriage drawn by four horses. Leaving New York, then the seat of government, Oct. 15, the round trip lasted until the 13th of November, or within one day of a month.

THE watermelon business in southwestern Georgia has been overdone, and many growers will change their crops. The man who bought the first carload of melons in Fort Valley paid $60 for them, and he thought he was going to make a small fortune on the transaction. When the melons were shipped the parties to whom they were consigned surprised him by drawing on him for $18. He was out just that much on the speculation.

A QUEER looking animal, that might possibly be a young sea serpent, has been seen on the banks of a stream near Shieldsville, Minn. It was seen by only one man, and he got but an unsatisfactory look at it, the animal disappearing when he got close to it. He describes the "what is it" as being the shape of a cigar, brown in color and about twenty-five or thirty feet long. It is alleged that a beast that answers this description was seen in the neighborhood about three years ago.

A PENURIOUS old fellow went to a Maine country grocery store one day and asked the price of an empty molasses hogshead. The price was not satisfactory and a long wrangle finally resulted in the old man making a very mean offer, which was indignantly refused. "No, sir," said the grocer, "you cannot steal that hogshead, but I will give it to you if you earn it by rolling it home." It was in the spring and there was a layer of soft snow on the ground, but the challenge was accepted and old Parsimony rolled the hogshead a distance of more than a mile. He was not a strong man, except in will, and it cost him his life, for he never did any more work and died in a few weeks.

J. C. CONROY, assistant to the general manager of the Omaha, has just completed an improved letter file which is a model of convenience.

ALL St. Louis roads are complaining of a shortage of freight cars. It is not because they cannot obtain possession of their own property. Many small roads, especially in the cotton belt and throughout the South, have on their tracks cars belonging to the trunk lines which they state they will not be able to return and ignore all demands. The reason for this refusal of the Southern roads to return the cars, is that the low price of cotton has caused planters to hold back their crops and freight that would have been moved long ago had it not been handled.

He—"Why do you break the engagement?" She—"Because pa's dog bit you last night, and I would not run the risk of bringing hydrophobia into the family for the whole world."

It is believed that women contract the predilection about their ages from the way, when they are little girls, their parents lie about the same subject to conductors and ticket sellers.

"Give me the man who sings at his work," says a writer. He can have him. And amusement-goers will approve also of giving him many of the men and women who sing on the stage, providing he can induce them to follow some other calling.

She (pining for pleasant words)—Oh, George, I cannot understand it. Why do you lavish this wealth of love on me when there are so many girls more beautiful and more worthy than I? He—I'm darned if I know.

Watts—"I suppose your wife is like most women—never admits that she made a mistake." Wickwire—"Oh, she occasionally asserts that she made a mistake marrying me, but she never admits even that outside of the family."

Lawyer—"Did you ever notice any signs of insanity in the defendant?" Witness—"Only on one occasion. A passenger picked up a dollar in a horse car one day and he was the only man on board who said he hadn't lost it."

"Willets—"Tell me, really, are you just as happy, now you are married, as you were when you were engaged?" Millets—"Why, certainly. Her father pays all of her expenses just the same as he did before we were married."

"And now, my good man, what are you going to do with it?" asked the stingy rich man of a beggar to whom he had given a two-cent piece. "That's just what troubles me, sir. It is so hard to make a wise descision; and I have always been unaccustomed to wealth."

They had chicken for dinner, and the host said to the guest: "Didn't I hear you say that you liked the neck of the chicken best? The visitor, who liked the necks with some of the rest, said: "Yes." "Well, you shall have both of these necks," and that was all he got.—Christian Advocate.

Resident—Do you see that fat, jolly-looking man across the street? When he came to this country ten years ago he had just money enough to buy a little patch of ground on a creek bottom. Now he's worth $50,000. Made it all by farming and dairying and good management. Stranger—Who is that old, thin, faded-looking woman with him? "That's his wife."—Chicago Tribune.

A very busy Chicago banker was to be married to an Omaha girl, and the day fixed was June 4, at high noon. The day came, but the groom did not materialize, and at 9 A. M. this telegram was received: "For heaven's sake tell us what is the matter, this is your wedding day; the hour approaches." He was scared half out of his wits, and rushing to the telegraph office sent this answer: "Thought I had three days grace. Don't let it go to protest. Coming on the next train." The wedding was late, but it was a merry one, and all was forgiven.

Servant Girls in Montana.

The most thoroughly disgusted people at the lack of women in Montana are those who employ domestic help in the cities. Hundreds of girls come to Helena and Butte each month looking for work, which they secure without difficulty at wages ranging from $20 to $40 a month. After spending a month in the city, they learn that they can get better wages and have a much better chance of securing a husband and a home of their own by going out to some one of the numerous mining camps, which they immediately proceed to do, and the housewife is forced again, perhaps for the thousandth time, to initiate another pilgrim domestic.—San Francisco Chronicle.

THE WAR IS ENDED.

Contending Factions in Chili Cease Their Fighting and Choose a Provisional President.

Balmacedists in Only One Province Declare Their Intention of Continuing the Fight.

VALPARAISO, Chili, Sept. 1.—Gen. Rasquedano has been recognized as president ad interim of the republic by the members of the Junta here.

The government troops at Conception, Talahuano and other places have notified the Congressionalist authorities that they have finished fighting and are ready to obey orders from Junta and only Coquimbo promises to make trouble.

All that remains to be done now is to put down the sporadic cases of disorder, bring to trial such of the Balmacedist officials as have been guilty of outrages and acts of tyranny and prepare for the elections which will again give the republic an unquestioned constitutional government.

Senor Godoy thinks that Balmaceda has escaped to Buenos Ayres.

Several of the prominent government officials will be shot to-morrow afternoon by martial law. Balmaceda's officials at Coquimbo have cut the English cable there and have refused to surrender, but will make a fight. The Esmeralda with the Lynch goes to Coquimbo to-night. Transports with troops will follow.

The first and so far the only execution occurred here to-day. The procurator fiscal Fas, who prosecuted the cases against the men who were alleged to be in a plot to blow up the torpedo boats Almirante, Lynch and Almirante Condell and the transport Imperial, which resulted in the execution of Cummings and two others, was taken out and shot.

EZETA CHECKMATED.

An American Captain Gets Ahead of the President of Salvador.

SAN FRANCISCO, Sept. 1.—A Panama steamer brings a story which shows the true inwardness of the attempt by President Ezeta of Salvador to seize five Salvadorian refugees in the Pacific Mail steamer City of Panama, in La Union, and to confiscate the vessel when his scheme failed.

The cable brought an outline of the story, but it gave no reasons for the attempted seizure, which was precisely a similar case to the Barrundia affair, except that in this case Salvador was the aggressor and tried to capture exiles whom President Ezeta hated. The leader among the five refugees on board the Panama was Gen. Letona. He, with others, bought tickets at Corinto, Nicaragua, for San Jose de Guatemala. Gen. Letona has spent five years in exile in Nicaragua. Ezeta's enmity against him is due to the fact that when commander-in-chief of the Salvadorian army, Letona ordered 100 lashes laid on the back of Ezeta, then a private in the army. Hernandez Ayala and the other Salvadorian refugees have all incurred the wrath of Ezeta, Ayala being the president legally elected, whom Ezeta forced out by intrigues, and Rivas being a nephew of the general who last year headed the unsuccessful revolt against Ezeta. Brannan, the fifth refugee, is an American contractor, who became mixed up in Salvadorian politics.

When the vessel reached La Union the commandant of the port came out with thirteen heavily armed soldiers in a launch. Capt. White only permitted the commandant to board the vessel. Then the officer made a formal demand for the surrender of Letona. This the captain refused. Then the threat was made that the steamer would not be given clearance papers until Letona was surrendered. Capt. White waited four hours for papers and then left. At La Libertad the commandant came aboard and declared he had Ezeta's order to take charge of the ship. This roused the captain's anger and he ordered the commandant ashore, at the same time arming all his men and getting out the hot-water hose, ready to repel an attack. Capt. White at once sailed.

He heard Ezeta was on the way with a large body of troops to seize the steamer, so he did not touch at Acajutla, where a stop is usually made, but kept five miles out. With glasses it could be seen that a large body of men were at the wharf, and when the steamer passed by they boarded a train and left for the interior. They were probably Ezeta's force.

BALMACEDA'S SUCCESSOR.

Chilian Insurgents Look Favorably Upon Don Augustin Edwards.

LONDON, Sept. 1.—It is reported here on the strength of statements made by the congressional agents in Paris and London that Don Augustin Edwards will be the next president of Chili.

He is one of the wealthiest, if not the wealthiest, of Chilians, and in the early period of the insurrection he supplied funds lavishly for the support of the revolutionary cause. He has many friends in the higher classes in England and on the continent, and is largely interested in the nitrate trade. He has a splendid farm in Chili, which, up to the time of the war, was stocked with the best blooded cattle that money could obtain in Europe. These cattle, during the war, were slaughtered for food for Balmaceda's troops, and the property of Edwards both in city and country was laid waste. He narrowly escaped with his own life. The congressionalists have always looked to him as their leading representative, although he has not taken an active personal part in naval or military affairs.

The active head of the revolution has been George Montt, who with Silva and Barros Luco formed the governing junta. It is said that Montt is in favor of Edwards for president.

The congressionalists have, within the few days, brought strong pressure to bear on the British foreign office to secure British influence against the transfer to Balmaceda of the silver shipped from Valparaiso in a British war vessel. There is very little likelihood that the treasure will be turned over to Balmaceda.

Leased an Opera House.

RED WING, Minn., Special, Sept. 1.—C. M. George of St. Paul has leased the opera house here for one year from Sept. 1, 1891, and will operate it in connection with the Mankato house, leased by his brother, in a new theatrical circuit.

Killed While Gambling.

MURFREESBORO, Tenn., Sept. 1.—Harrison and Will Smith, colored, and Bob Lytte, a gambler, while playing a game of craps last night in Harrison Smith's saloon near Salem became involved in a difficulty which terminated in a desperate fight. Lytte suddenly drew a revolver and fired upon his antagonists, instantly killing Harrison Smith and fatally wounding his brother Will. The latter was shot in the breast just below the heart and cannot recover. Lytte has been arrested and committed to jail.

AFRAID OF RUSSIA.

Turkey Compelled to Grant Her Worst Enemy a Great Privilege.

LONDON, Sept. 1.—A telegram from Constantinople says that the sultan has yielded to all of Russia's demands respecting the Dardanelles, which henceforth will be opened to Russian vessels when closed to others. The sultan has abjectly apologized for the recent detention of a Russian vessel and has punished the officers responsible therefor, and has promised an indemnity forthwith.

A number of years ago a treaty was concluded between the five great powers and Turkey and provides that no ship of war belonging to any nation save Turkey shall pass the Dardanelles without the express consent of Turkey, but Russia claimed the vessel, while having arms on board, was a volunteer fleet bound for the eastern terminus of the Trans-Siberian railroad.

The St. James Gazette this evening holds that the submission of the porte to Russia's demands establishes a precedent which permits Russian war ships to use the passage of the Dardanelles as they please, while the war ships of other nations must not enter those straits. This news, therefore, according to the same paper, is by far the gravest published for some time.

GERMANS INDIGNANT.

BERLIN, Sept. 1.—The press here is incredulous regarding the report of the sultan's submission to Russia's demands respecting the recent detention of the Russian volunteer fleet steamers at the Dardanelles. The Vossisches Zeitung says that such action on the sultan's part would justify the removal of Turkey from among the independent states of Europe.

MEXICO NEXT.

The Land of the Aztecs on the Verge of a Bloody Revolution.

SAN FRANCISCO, Sept. 1.—Private advices from the City of Mexico state that the outcome of the war in Chili is anxiously awaited in Mexico, and in case the insurgents win, the result will hasten the revolution now smoldering in the land of the Aztecs.

The letter, which comes from an old and prominent citizen of Mexico, says that in truth Diaz is the Balmaceda of Mexico, and that he is guilty of nearly the same offenses against human liberty as Balmaceda. Like the president of Chili, President Diaz has had a career of tyranny. He has suppressed all public meetings and all newspapers antagonistic to him and his policy. He has collected taxes and disbursed public money without authority. He has throttled free speech and free press in Mexico, and has put to death half a score of Mexican journalists. It will not be many days before a serious blow will be struck by the people against the dictatorial reign of Diaz.

In furthering his personal interests, Diaz is charged with combining with foreign capitalists and accepting bribes from foreign corporations in return for valuable concessions. While he became a man of great wealth, the people of his republic have grown poorer and poorer. As the leader of the Liberal party, and against the Clericals, Diaz has gradually become more and more unpopular with the masses, who are Catholic and members of the Clerical party. The fact that the natives are with the Clericals makes the antagonism to Diaz overwhelming. Ever since the marriage of Diaz to an American Protestant the wrath of the masses has been nursed, but it has grown until now it can be kept within bounds no longer.

During the past few days important military changes have taken place, and Diaz, who reads the handwriting on the wall, is preparing to put down any insurrection that may take place. The Clericals, however, pay no attention to the movements of the military, for they outnumber the soldiers of Diaz ten to one. Diaz has been politic in appointing his personal friends as governors of different states, and in each state the Diaz governor has been given absolute control of the militia in his provinces.

Diaz and his followers, who are in a hopeless minority, are, in reality, trembling in the balance, and the situation has grown so critical during the last few weeks that a strict guard is kept, and at the first signs of an outbreak Diaz proposes to slaughter the revolutionists in a way which he hopes will awe and torrorize the great mass of natives who are against him. There seems to be no outcome to the present critical condition of affairs but a fierce and bloody revolution.

THE WORK OF A FIEND.

An Old Connecticut Couple Murdered in a Horrible Manner.

HARTFORD, Conn., Sept. 1.—A murder more fiendish than any in the annals of crime in this county was committed in Bloomfield early yesterday morning. At that time Henry Frederick Bushenhagen, aged sixty-nine years, and his wife Emily, aged seventy-one, were killed by a tramp, to whom they had given shelter. Not content with simply killing them, he had frightfully mutilated their bodies and then thrown the bleeding corpses into an old well. When the fearful crime was made known the excitement in Bloomfield was intense. Men worked into a passion of wrath, hunted through the adjacent woods intent on apprehending the assassin, but without avail.

Mr. Bushenhagen's body had four large wounds in the head, probably made with a coupling pin, which was found in the yard. On Mrs. Bushenhagen's body were five wounds, every one of which crushed the skull. These are believed to have been made with an ax.

Robbery was not the motive for the murder. No article was missing from the house and it was evident that the murderer's first thought after placing the bodies in the well was to get away from the scene.

Typhoon in Japan.

VANCOUVER, B. C., Sept. 1.—The steamer Empress of Japan brings news of a great typhoon in Japan that caused the loss of two hundred lives. The typhoon struck the steamer on the evening of Aug. 16 and lasted until the following night. The German vessel Helen Rickmers was driven ashore from her anchorage and wrecked. Twenty or thirty of her crew are believed to have been drowned. While the typhoon was in progress the lighters which were bringing the vessel cargo and provisions were washed away, a number of men being drowned. Great damage to property and loss of life resulted all along the coast.

Started a Bank.

GRAND FORKS, N. D., Special Telegram, Sept. 1.—The First National Bank of East Grand Forks, Minn., was organized to-day, with a capital of $50,000. Alex Griggs is president; William Budge, vice president; E. R. Jacobi, cashier. John Buckholz of this city has purchased the Bank of Ardock. Capital, $20,000.

Uncut Wheat Burned.

MOORHEAD, Minn., Special Telegram, Sept. 1.—An accidental fire occurred on the Grandin farm near Georgetown, eighteen miles north of here. A separator was burned and the fire ran through the stubble, burning thirty acres of wheat belonging to the Grandin and E. J. Clark farms.

Bridge Contract Awarded.

HASTINGS, Minn., Special, Sept. 1.—The Clinton Bridge and Iron company of Clinton Iowa was awarded the contract this evening to erect a new steel low truss bridge, sixty-two feet span, across the Vermillion river for $875.

MURDERED A CHILD.

That is the Charge Brought Against a Mysterious Couple in Brown County.

Starvation Alleged to Be the Method by Which the Child Was Put Out of the Way.

NEW ULM, Minn., Special Telegram, Sept. 1.—There was brought to this city to-day an old man and a young woman, delegated to remain in jail here until January under a charge of murder. They come from Golden Gate, in this county, and if the charge against them is true it reveals a story of cruelty and heartlessness that has never been equaled in these parts before.

The old man claims to be a doctor, a graduate of a college in the old country. He possesses more than the average amount of shrewdness.

The companion of his crime is one who claims to be his niece or cousin, but there are many who think she is his daughter. She is less than thirty years old, and has been living with him since he settled in Golden Gate. In April she became the mother of twins. Steps were taken then to indict the pair for living together unlawfully, but were futile.

This caused them to endeavor to get rid of the children, and, as none of the neighbors would take them, it seems they made up their minds to get rid of the children by an inhuman system of starvation. Note was taken of this by neighbor, but in spite of the efforts of kind friends the children were not allowed to obtain food, and one of them died. A coroner's inquest followed and then the arrests. The charge was for murder, and sufficient evidence was found to bind them over to the district court.

The young woman sticks to the story given by the old man, but so plain was it that the child was starved that no trouble was met with in confining them for several months under the worst charge known to the law.

When brought to this city to-day the young woman was greatly afraid, and it is thought that she would confess all when she is kept apart from the doctor, whose name is August Brodda. She is accompanied by the remaining child, who is also almost starved to death.

The old doctor takes it all without concern. He depends much on his own shrewdness and laughs at the lawyers who are conducting the prosecution.

The testimony is so sensational and at the same time reveals such unusual cruelty that it has worked up any amount of feeling among the people of the vicinity of Golden Gate. Had not the county attorney taken action it is more than probable that the doctor would have been the central figure in a lynching bee.

UNFORTUNATE INDIANS.

They Have No Outfits With Which to Do Their Logging.

WASHINGTON, Special Telegram, Sept. 1.—An inspector for the Indian office has reported to the department here that a large amount of timber has been burned over on the Lac du Flambeau reservation, which is under the La Pointe agency in Wisconsin. It is estimated that between 40,000,000 and 50,000,000 feet have been killed by the forest fires, and unless it is soon disposed of it will be entirely destroyed.

The Indian bureau has no funds on hand with which to equip the Indians for the logging and thus put the timber on the market. The law says that the dead and down timber on the reservations must be disposed of by the Indians, they to carry on the logging operations and the timber sold for their benefit. Acting Commissioner Belt has written to Agent Leahy asking that officer to see if arrangements cannot be made with Farmer Sullivan at the agency, who is a practical lumberman, by which the Indians may be furnished an outfit by the dealers in lumber so that they may this winter engage in logging the great amount of dead and down timber on their lands.

It is hoped that at least the Indians may obtain an outfit on credit and make payment when the logs are delivered. If the logs are not removed this winter they will be practically useless, for they will decay rapidly in the condition they are now in.

OFFICIALLY CONFIRMED.

Corroborative Reports of the Fall of President Balmaceda.

WASHINGTON, Sept. 1.—Official corroboration of Balmaceda's fall reached the state and navy departments to-day. Acting Secretary Wharton received the following cablegram, dated Aug. 30, 9:30 p. m.:

Balmaceda has turned over government to Baquedano and fled. Canto goes to Santiago to-night to assume control until arrival Junta from Iquique. Good order here.

M'CREERY, Consul.

Acting Secretary Soley also received the following cablegram from Admiral Brown dated Valparaiso, Aug. 30:

President of Chili has surrendered the government to the Chilian general Baquedano, and he has left Santiago. Valparaiso well organized. The foreign forces have re-embarked.

BROWN.

The above is somewhat obscure, but it is interpreted at the department to mean that the police force in Valparaiso is so well organized as to relieve the foreign admirals of further necessity for keeping their marines on shore duty.

EUROPEAN CROPS.

Their Failure General and Great Distress Will Be the Result.

NEW YORK, Sept. 1.—Col. J. B. Montgomery of Oregon has just returned from Germany and is now at the Fifth Avenue hotel. He was asked about the crop failure in Europe and said:

The crop failure in Europe is general and distress is sure to follow. I was all over Germany and saw that the rain had ruined the wheat and rye. In Germany there will be a shortage in the grain crops of 33 per cent, or just 100,000,000 bushels. The empire generally produces 240,000,000 bushels of rye and 30,000,000 bushels of wheat annually. With the great falling off mentioned the people will have to look to this country for relief. Russia is short and can't supply Germany, and France is not much better off. The potato crop in continental Europe has been more or less a failure and the people look with longing eyes toward America. I am not a speculator in grain, but I predict that by Christmas wheat in this country will sell at $1.50 per bushel owing to the great demand in Europe.

Rates From Milwaukee.

CHICAGO, Sept. 1.—A conference of the Milwaukee committee and Chicago committee of the Central Traffic association with representatives of boat lines crossing the lake will be held at Milwaukee Thursday to discuss rates from Milwaukee to Eastern points via Benton Harbor. Traffic Manager Murray, of the Big Four road, controlling the Elkhart Fast Freight line, which was the first to reduce the rate by this route, has agreed to be present at the conference. The reduced rates have been withdrawn pending this discussion of the matter, and it is expected that an amicable settlement of the question at issue will be reached.

SOUTHERN MINNESOTA FAIR.

The Opening Day One of Great Confusion.

ROCHESTER, Minn., Special, Sept. 1.—Beautiful weather ushered in the first day of the twelfth annual Southern Minnesota fair. At the grounds as yet all is confusion, owing to an excess of exhibits in all departments over the exhibiting space.

To-morrow will practically be the first day and some fine races are promised. The following is the programme: 10 to 12 a. m., pony races, foot races, dog races and games for children. In the afternoon the two-year-old stake race for trotters, with thirteen entries, purse $425; three-year-old stake race for trotters, nine entries, purse $325; 2:28 class for trotters, purse $7,000. Among the leading attractions is the great Second regiment band, which will not only furnish music for the reunion of the Second regiment Minnesota Volunteers, Thursday, but during the entire fair.

MANY NEW CLAIMANTS.

Mrs. Hopkins-Searles' Poor Relations Will Attempt to Break Her Will.

NEW YORK, Sept. 1.—According to the World Edward F. Searles will not be allowed to enjoy Mark Hopkins' millions without a struggle.

Twenty-one new claimants to Mrs. Hopkins-Searles' estate have appeared, and a notice of contest was sent last week to Great Barrington, Mass. Several of the claimants have joined hands with Timothy Hopkins, and this probably induced him to decline recently an offer of $5,000,000 not to oppose the probate of the will. On the contrary, the adopted son of Mrs. Searles will file on Sept. 17, his claims, which will be the opening wedge for one of the most sensational will contests on record.

During the past week Lawyer Russell Wilson of San Francisco, representing Timothy Hopkins, has been in the city consulting with Butler, Stillman & Hubbard, counsel for Mr. Searles. Lawyer Frank Rogers also notified Mr. Searles' lawyers last Thursday of his intention to contest Mrs. Searles' will on the ground of insanity and undue influence on the part of her husband. He represented the Hebbard family, second cousins of Mrs. Searles. He also said he intended joining hands with Lawyer Russell Wilson. It appears that Mrs. Searles had many poor relatives, whom she occasionally assisted. Some received a regular yearly income.

"You are just as dear to me," she is reported to have said one day to William Hebbard, "as the richest of my acquaintances. You will all be remembered handsomely in my will. You are not so numerous that I cannot well afford to make you a large bequest."

Mrs. Searles frequently visited her relatives in New York and Connecticut before her second marriage. Two infirm cousins, Harriet Hebbard and Mrs. Jane Smith used to get an annuity of $300. They were equally shocked with all the other blood relations, who had been assured of something substantial, when they heard Mrs. Searles had overlooked them in her will. The annuity of $300 to Jane Smith and Harriet Hebbard was stopped and nothing was left the other blood relatives.

The contestants have united in two parties. One wing consists of the Hebbards and the other of the Sherwoods, all being either first or second cousins. The Hebbards have secured Lawyer Rogers of Bridgeport, and will co-operate with Timothy Hopkins, but the Sherwoods believe in the merits of their own case.

A BROKEN FLANGE.

Causes a Wreck in Which Four Are Killed and Sixteen Injured.

EVANSVILLE, Ind., Sept. 1.—To-day between Tell City and Troy, Ind., a mixed train, in which were twenty passengers, encountered a broken flange. The engine left the track, bumped on the ties for awhile and then took a header down a steep embankment. All the cars piled on it. The passengers were all taken out, four dead and sixteen more or less scalded from escaping steam and otherwise injured. The wreck took fire and burned up completely. Engineer Jake App and his fireman escaped injury by jumping. Conductor Gordon in the coach was badly hurt. The following is a list of the casualties:

Dead—Emma Schu, ten years old; Robert Grau, four years old; Mrs. Sarah Graum, Mrs. Barbara Memeyer.

Injured—Sidney Hess, Kate Kelso, William Newman, Kate Chase and child, Manuel Durbon, Henry Bodin, Michael Elberthorn, Mrs. William Newman, G. F. Bott.

The wreck was on the Louisville, New Albany & St. Louis railway. All the injured are in Tell City. Nearly all the passengers were from local points on the road

A MARKET FOR ALL.

Opening Session of the International Grain Market in Vienna.

VIENNA, Sept. 1.—The international grain market for 1891 was opened here to-day with a large attendance. Herr Haardt, from the department of the chief of the ministry of commerce, in a speech made during the opening ceremonies, dwelt upon the special importance of the present market from the fact that its task or object was to devise means of supplying the shortage of grain existing in the large countries.

The dealings to-day were limited, so there was no spot business done in wheat. Futures were firm. The best barleys sold on the spot at full rates; inferior grades were neglected. Autumn wheat was quoted at 10.67 florins to 10.70 florins; spring wheat was quoted at 10.27 florins. Autumn rye was quoted at 10.38 florins; spring at 10.58 florins. Autumn oats were quoted at 6.27 florins. New maize was quoted at 6.28 florins. Thirty trucks of old maize brought 6.35 florins.

The Interstate Exhibition.

LA CROSSE, Wis., Special Telegram, Sept. 1.—The interstate fair opened to-day with entries in every department considerably in excess of the splendid exhibition last year. The superintendents of the departments say there are no finer horses, cattle, sheep and swine in America than now on the grounds. The entries of poultry run up above 1,000. There is a fine display of machinery and manufactured goods in the various departments, and the exposition building is crowded to its fullest capacity. Horsemen say the track is the best for a half mile they have ever seen, and there are prospects for very fast time. In a wager race to-day between Palmer's Poco Tempo and Grattan's Michael, the latter won after a hot contest. Best time, 2:31½. The main streets of the city are illuminated by arches and devices in which 3,000 incandescent lights, 1,000 gas jets, and many are lights are used.

It is a sight worth visiting La Crosse to see.

A Bishop's Silver Anniversary.

MARQUETTE, Mich., Sept. 1.—The silver anniversary of Bishop Vertin has been made the occasion for a grand celebration, which begins to-day. Archbishop Katzer of Milwaukee, Bishops Richter of Grand Rapids, Rademacher of Nashville, and Ulrak, titular bishop of Antinoe, Abbot Lochikar of Minnesota, Monsignor Zininger of Milwaukee; Administrator Kersten of Green Bay; Father Englert, provincial of Franciscans, Cincinnati; Fathers Ramur, Albrecht, Keogh, Fagan, Fairbanks, Hannon and Suley of Milwaukee were among the visitors from outside the diocese.

THE FARMER'S COLUMN.

USEFUL INFORMATION FOR RURAL READERS.

Farmer's Investments--Suppressing the Pea Weevil--A Curiosity in Gardening--Destroy the Weeds

Farmer's Investments.

Some farmers—in fact, a great many farmers—are out of debt and have surplus cash to invest, and the question for them to consider is where and in what can they make the safest and most profitable investment. This question the American Cultivator answers by advising them to invest in, not in buying more land, but improve the acres they already possess. They should but their surplus into their business, as the wise merchant or manufacturer does. The Cultivator says:

"When a thoroughbred or a high-grade cow will make $100 worth of butter in a year, and a scrub cow only $40 worth, while it cost but little more to feed one than the other, money invested in improved breeds of cows, or in a pure male from which to raise up a herd of grades, will pay better returns to the dairymen than can be obtained from bank stock or railroad shares or Western farm mortgages.

When a small extra investment in better seeds and more liberal manuring will increase the labor of cultivation, or when extra cultivation will increase in the money return four times as great as the expenditure; when better tools will save their cost in one season's labor, while with care they will do good work for five or ten years, then is the time when the farmer can make money by spending money.

When the expenditure of $25 of $35 per acre for tile drains will enable a field that now yields less than $10 worth of poor grass a season to produce $35 worth of the best, and fit it for the growth of any crop that will yield profitable returns it is economy to spend money, and so it is when a similar sum or a smaller one will so renovate an old pasture which now only feeds about one cow upon six acres, so that it will give more feed and better for six times that number.

"In short, every farmer should see for himself the manner in which he could improve his land, his buildings, animals, tools or methods of working, so that a dollar invested will be placed at a better rate of interest than any one else will pay him for it. If he doubles the producing capacity of his land, it is better than it would be to double the number of acres, and if he spends his money judiciously, and uses good judgment in managing his business afterward he has not lost his money, but has changed an idle dollar that only earned five cents in a year for lively one that will earn twenty-five cents And when he has made such improvements that his business is up to its full capacity, or to the measure of his capacity as a manager, then he may indulge in the luxuries of life and may deliver over his surplus profits to the bankers and the speculators, to take care of or to lose for him as he may choose."

Suppressing the Pea Weevil.

This is not so difficult a task as to get rid of some other insect enemies, and it should be the aim of every one whose peas are found to be more or less "buggy" to undertake the work of suppression without delay.

By breaking open the pods of peas which show little yellow specks on the outside—the eggs or egg-shells of the grubs—you will find the grubs crawling over the peas, or minute holes where they have punctured the peas and entered. They are very small and yellow in color, with dark heads. If they have been several days in the peas they can be located by dark green blotches on the surface.

The insect doing the injury, according to Prof. Gillette, is the little beetle, or weevil, so often found in peas at planting time. The only remedy is prevention. One man raising "buggy peas" year after year will stock the neighborhood with this pest. The only preventive is to stop importing or keeping over, for any purpose whatever, "buggy peas" unless they are kept in closed receptacles and the weevils destroyed.

One of the best methods of destroying the beetle is to keep all infested peas over one year in perfectly tight bins, boxes or sacks, when all weevils that hatch, being unable to escape, will die. Another method is to put the peas in a tight bin and pour over them carbon bisulphide and keep the bin air tight for several days. The fumes will kill every weevil and not injure the peas.

The ease with which these pests may be gotten rid of makes it next door to a criminal offense to continue to grow "buggy" peas. The Professor vigorously remarks that any one who will knowingly raise such infested peas and allow the insects to escape to pollute so valuable an article of food raised by all his neighbors, after he knows how to prevent it, ought to be liable to prosecution for willfully perpetrating a public nuisance.

Destroy the Weeds.

For the benefit of my fellow farmers I wish to write a short chapter on weeds and the methods of destruction as practiced by some. It is a continual fight in old settled communities to avoid being overrun by them. There is some wild carrot creeping into this country, and proper steps for its suppression are not being taken. I believe there is a law making it an offensive subject to a fine, to permit carrot to grow on one's premises. So far as known to the writer, most men try to destroy them, but the method of destruction is better calculated to distribute them than otherwise. They are frequently pulled and thrown in the road, to be trampled under foot, but this will not prevent the washing of seed to adjacent low lands, and there aid in their distribution. If it is a finable offense to grow wild carrot, it should be made a more serious offense to distribute them in the manner spoken of. Farmers ought to think better of their neighbors than to be willing aids in the dissemination of such pests. It is no uncommon thing to find the common sour dock thrown into the roads, at this season of the year, when the seed is ripe and ready for transportation by the first shower. Just a few days since I observed a neighbor had thrown docks in the road on a hill above, and in close proximity to his nearest neighbor, and thunder showers must distribute the seeds to lands below. This is not right; it is not observing the golden rule. Care should be taken to gather and burn the seed if permitted to get ripe at all. The better plan is to cut in the spring when begining to start the seed stalk. If left later press of other matters usually permits their ripening. Sour dock is one of the most persistent weeds in our meadows, and at time of cutting grass they should all be carefully picked out by hand and burned, to avoid their distributing in the manure. Can't the farmers of Ohio be induced in some manner to be more careful in weed destruction? Doubtless there are plenty of men now engaged in trying by political methods to relieve farmers of their burdens; but friends, a good hoe or cythe used on weeds at the proper time will pay in good looks, if nothing else. Farmers don't let the weeds go to seed.—Hiram Cope in Ohio Farmer.

Starving Trees.

Here and there on all farms, and in most fruit gardens will be seen an occasional tree or grapevine which seems to lack vigor—does not grow well, and yet seems to have no particular disease. The probabilities are that the tree is dying of starvation and needs a liberal supply of food. When you give it this ration, do not pile a load of manure around the trunk of a tree or the body of a grapevine. This is just the place where it will do the least good. Nearest the trunk of the tree the roots are all large. The fibrous roots are all large. The fibrous roots, the feeders are farther off near the end of the roots. These only can take up the nutriment. It is always safe to assume that the roots extend as far from the trunk in every direction as do the limbs of the trees, and to properly fertilize, spread the manure all over that area.—Western Rural.

Keeping Ducks.

There is an advantage in keeping ducks that very little has been said about. They require less room than any other fowl. Give them clean quarters and plenty of food and clean water to drink and they will do well. Twenty to thirty ducks can be kept and raised to good size for the table on a piece of ground large enough for a pen of chickens. They will live and thrive on coarser food than any other fowls, and require less attention. They are also less liable to disease. The improved varieties require only a vessel of drinking water. If the young are kept dry until feathered there is little to fear.

A Curiosity in Gardening.

Here is a little scientific curiosity from the Gardeners' Chronicle:

"The roots of plants are formed within the substance of the plant, and make their way out from the center to the circumference, not only, if at all, by pressure exerted during the growth, but by secreting a digestive ferment which softens and dissolves the tissues and allows the emergence of the root.

"Now the roots of the couch coming into contact with the potato exercise a similar property, and are thus enabled to penetrate the tuber.

"There is no theory, but has recently been demonstrated by a French experimenter.

Doing Better.

The small farmer everywhere is generally doing better, says an exchange, than the large farmer. That this is true may easily be proven by inquiring into the relative prosperity of the 40-acre farmer and the 100-acre in your own neighborhood. Which is burdened with the least debt in proportion to the real value of his land? Which is procuring the best profit upon his capital and the largest money yield per acre, and which gets the most satisfaction out of the business of agriculture? One trouble is that we have been too grasping in regard to the land, and have acquired more than we could handle to the best advantage.

Farm Life.

The one great disadvantage of farm life is isolation. The farmer ought to mix freely with his fellow men, and know what is going on not only in his neighborhood, but in the world at large. In no way is the grange and alliance of more benefit than in bringing men together for a free exchange of thought. In these associations they may become acquainted with one another and so act together for the promotion of the general welfare. The farmer who stays at home all the time is apt to grow narrow in his ideas and methods, and to remain a little behind the age in which we live.

Kerosene vs. Linseed Oil.

Kerosene cannot be used in place of linseed oil advantageously by mixing colors with it for painting on wood. Kerosene strikes into wood at once, and if used in that way would soon leave only a coating of dry color which would easily brush off. Kerosene is refined from the crude oil petroleum, and for preserving wood from decay or preventing the rusting of iron by covering its surface with an oily coating, the latter is by far the preferable form for its use. It should simply be put on with a brush like paint, but wholly without any coloring matter.

Grant's - Memoirs.

Original $7.50 Edition, 50 Cents.

50 Cents!

NO book has ever had such a sale in the United States as General Grant's Memoirs. Over 650,000 copies have already gone into the homes of the rich, but the subscription price of $7 has placed it beyond the reach of people in moderate circumstances. If 650,000 people have been willing to pay $7 for Grant's Memoirs, there must be a couple of million people in the United States who want them, and will jump at the opportunity to buy at the low figure here offered.

We will send you General Grant's Memoirs, publisher's original edition, best paper, cloth, green and gold binding, hitherto sold by subscription at $7.00 and absolutely a proposition such as has never been made in the history of book publishing. The two splendid volumes of General Grant's Memoirs, of which 650,000 copies have already been sold—not a cheap edition, but the best—for 50 cents; PROVIDED you send your subscription to the NEWS for one year, and also a subscription of $3 for the Cosmopolitan magazine, the brightest and cheapest of the great illustrated monthlies, itself equal to the best $4 magazine.

The Cosmopolitan is enabled to make this offer because of the purchase of 600,000 volumes at a price which even publishers would deem impossible, and with the idea of running up its circulation to half a million copies. By contract with the Cosmopolitan the NEWS is enabled to offer to its readers a share in the low price obtained through the largest purchase of books ever made in the history of the world.

If, however, you have Grant's books, the Cosmopolitan's offer will permit you to take instead,

Gen, Sherman's Memoirs, 2 vols., sold by subscription for $5 00.
Gen. Sheridan's Memoirs, 2 vols. sold by subscription for $6.00.
Gen. McClelland's Memoirs, sold by subscription for..........$3.75.

All of these are bound in cloth, green and gold, in uniform style with Grant's Memoirs.

The Cosmopolitan and the NEWS are sent postage prepaid, but the postage on the books, at the rate of ½ cent per ounce, must be remitted with the order: Gen. Grants' Memoirs, 96 ounces, 48 cents; Gen. Sheridan's Memoirs, 92 oz.—46 cents; Gen. Sherman's Memoirs 84 oz—42 cents; Gen. McClellan's Memoirs, 48 oz.—24, cents, or books can be sent by express at the expense of the subscriber.

Send at once $3.00 for a year's subscription to the Cosmopolitan, $1.00 for a year's subscription to the NEWS and 50 cents for a set of Memoirs—$4.50 in all—to which add postage on the particular set of Memoirs selected.

If you are not acquainted with the magazine, send a postal card to the Cosmopolitan, Madison Square, New York City, for free sample copy.

CHAPTER I.

THE OLD MILL.

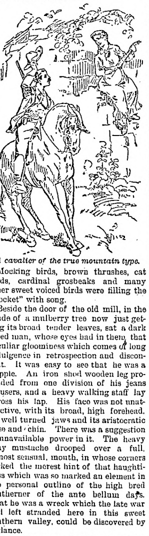
An old mill, mossy from roof comb to stony base, was rumbling and growling beside its brook. A big overshot water wheel, seemingly much out of proportion to the rest of the building, slowly revolved, with the gushing and gurgling water filling its slimy buckets.

Some wide armed oaks and slender pines grew all about. In every direction mountain peaks rose against the blue north Georgia sky. The air had all the freshness and fragrance of the south.

The mill fronted eastward, looking down a narrow, fertile valley, now just beginning to clothe itself in vernal splendors of leaf and flower; along the sinuous channel of the brook grew clumps of willows overtopped here and there by white armed plane trees and gnarled tulips—there called poplars.

A few humble houses, the homes of poor farmers, were scattered along the slopes of the valley, which was not more than three miles in its greatest width, and which cut through the mountains, some five miles east of the mill, by a jagged gap called the "Mouth of the Pocket."

Such fields as had been opened for cultivation in this little valley or "pocket," were tilled up against the mountain sides, and lay red and brown in the sunlight, save where the wheat and rye had made them a tender green. The forests of oak, hickory and pine ran in variegated billows to the very tops of the mountains. Wild flowers grew everywhere. In fact, no other region can compare with the hill country of north Georgia for the variety and loveliness of its wild flowers. Its woods and fields are gay with them from early spring until the drought of midsummer kills them.



A cavalier of the true mountain type.

Mocking birds, brown thrushes, cat birds, cardinal grosbeaks and many other sweet voiced birds were filling the "pocket" with song.

Beside the door of the old mill, in the shade of a mulberry tree now just getting its broad tender leaves, sat a dark faced man, whose eyes had in them that peculiar gloominess which comes of long indulgence in retrospection and discontent. It was easy to see that he was a cripple. An iron shod wooden leg protruded from one division of his jeans trousers, and a heavy walking staff lay across his lap. His face was not unattractive, with its broad, high forehead, its well turned jaws and its aristocratic nose and chin. There was a suggestion of unavailable power in it. The heavy gray mustache drooped over a full, almost sensual, mouth, in whose corners lurked the merest hint of that haughtiness which was so marked an element in the personal outline of the high bred southerner of the ante bellum days. That he was a wreck which the late war had left stranded here in this sweet southern valley, could be discovered by a glance.

Before the war he had been the owner of many slaves, a magnificent mountain home and a broad plantation farther "down the country," as the phrase went. Now he was the owner of the little old mossy "Pocket Mill," whose big dripping wheel and rasping buhrstones served to grind out for him and his family a humble subsistence. His two daughters aided him to serve the customers who brought their grain thither for grinding. His sons had all been killed in battle. An invalid wife helped to sadden his exile—for this life of poverty over here in the "pocket" was to Colonel Wilton Chenier, despite all its colors and perfume, its bird songs and its breezy freshness, nothing less than exile. He did not chafe, however, as the days and months and years creeping by gave him no promise of any better fortune, but quietly and gloomily accepted his fate. To-day, as he sat there smoking his brier root pipe and reading a novel, his face was no more nor no less hopeful than it was twelve years before, when he first came to live at the mill, just as the war clouds lifted and peace brought with it utter penury to him and his loved ones.

It is early May and early morning. The smoke from Colonel Wilton Chenier's pipe goes swiftly away on a fresh stream of mountain air that dips into the valley as if blowing out of that wonderful blue sky which hangs overhead. A tall, dark woman, still lithe and youthful in appearance despite her thirty-five years and the look of settled sorrow in her face, comes out of the mill with some light work in her hand, and sits down upon a weather beaten bench beside her father. You would at once know that she is the daughter of this man, she is so like him. As she bends over her sewing, her features fall into their habitual retrospective repose. Her hair and eyes are black, her nose small and straight, her mouth and chin well formed, her forehead low and broad. They make a strange, dark picture, these two sorrowful looking forms, outlined against the dull background of the old mill's mossy wall. They do not seem to note each other's presence. The growling of the mill is enlivened by the song of a mocking bird up in the mulberry tree. An ivory billed woodpecker is cackling merrily on the great oak yonder by the brook. From some indefinite distance comes the mellow tinkling of a cow bell.

Suddenly a few strong notes from the banjo came out of the mill. The man and woman looked up, a half smile lighting their gloomy faces. They always smiled when they heard the sound of that banjo, for the player was the life of the old mill's household.

Colonel Chenier ceased reading and Adelaide, his sad faced daughter, let fall her sewing as they both gazed upon a lovely apparition now passing out through the wide doorway of the mill. It was Rosalie Chenier, the colonel's youngest child. She held in her hand a banjo of fine workmanship, dark, old, with jeweled keys and polished silver screws. She sat down on the stone step and began to play a lively medley, made up of concordant bits snatched from this and that familiar old tune, a sort of mocking bird performance, which threw together the cheeriest parts of many pieces she knew.

She was beautiful, in the best sense of the word, from head to foot. Without lacking anything of a strong, almost voluptuous development, her form was slender, lithe and graceful, as so many mountain girls' forms are, and her features were of almost Grecian fineness and regularity. The color of her hair was that pale, sheeny gold, so seldom seen in the south, the true harvest yellow, very thick and long, plaited into two heavy braids and bound with scraps of blue ribbon. Her eyes were gray green, specked with amber, full of expression, clear, deep and innocent as a babe's. There was that in her complexion, beyond its extreme fairness, which is best called bloom, the warm flush of incomparable purity and health. She turned her head slightly to one side, keeping time with a slender, high arched foot as she played. The contrast of color and expression between her and the other two whom we have described were much stronger than mere words can make it appear. It was, in fact, the contrast between the new and the old, in all the phases of the two.

The big, outside, far away world of wealth and fashion and business turmoil had no immediate relationship to her life. Its doings had reached her only in the vaguest and most indefinite way, as rumors from another sphere, or as the murmur of a battle heard from a great distance. Unlike her father and her sister Adelaide, she had no war memories, nor recollections of former wealth and splendor, to keep her looking back to a better day. Three years old when the war ended, scarcely six when brought here to the mill, she had no distinct notion of life beyond the limits of this little valley. She had entered her eighteenth year knowing as little of social life as if she were still a child in the nursery. Of nature, however, she had learned much, and her father and mother had carefully taught her the usual routine lessons of the schools. For the rest she took to the banjo as naturally as does a mocking bird to singing, mastering its difficulties with scarcely an effort. She had found this fine old instrument hidden away in a pile of rubbish in the attic of the mill, where its owner had left it at some distant time. No doubt it had been hidden there, that it might escape the fate of everything valuable which came in the way of Sherman's army. As for its real owner, he may have fallen in defense of the lost cause. At all events, he had never returned to claim it.

In the south the banjo during the days of slavery was looked upon as a rude and savage instrument, fit only for the hands and taste of negroes. It bore the brand of everything connected with the pathetic life of the slave. The wonder is that long ago this fascinating lyre of the cabin was not lifted to its proper place, which was beside the violin. No doubt the secret of its neglect lay in the fact that it was treated as a negro instrument, and regarded as one of the symbols of slave life.

Rosalie Chenier had beautiful hands, white, slender, perfectly formed, and the act of playing upon the banjo disclosed all their suppleness and grace. She was not conscious of her beauty, however, and was as sincere and outright in her actions as were the birds.

There was something in her attitudes and movements that would have been bizarre had the element of utter simplicity been wanting. She was dressed in inexpensive white muslin, upon which the flour dust of the mill would not show, and around her waist was a band of pale blue ribbon.

The pure notes of the banjo made themselves distinctly heard above the rumbling of the buhrstones, the creaking of gudgeons and the bubbling of the flume stream.

Colonel Chenier had closed his book and was gazing at Rosalie with an air of dreamy interest, as one indulging in pathetic fancies.

Suddenly the musician ceased her playing and said:

"Oh, yonder comes Frank Ellis down the trail."

"How do you know it is, Rose?" inquired her father, looking over the valley to where the red trail zigzagged its way along the steep slope.

"Because it is a white horse; and then no one else would ride so fast down that trail. It is Frank, I am sure."

"Oh, quite likely," said Colonel Chenier, refilling his pipe. "Where is he going so often up the valley of late?"

"He has cattle in the range up there, or something, hasn't he?" suggested Miss Adelaide.

"I don't know, I'm sure," said Rosalie, making a whorl of her pretty hand and looking through it at the far away horseman.

"I hope if it's Frank he'll have something new to tell us," said Adelaide.

"He'll bring some papers and magazines, I dare say," said Rosalie. "I am real hungry to read a new story." She got up as she spoke and went to a fragment of a stone wall, upon which she climbed to get a better view of the distant trail. Perched up there she sang a snatch from a simple song, playing a low accompaniment the while.

"There is a moonshine establishment up the gulch, west somewhere," said Colonel Chenier, in a low voice to Adelaide. She started a little and after a moment's reflection:

"Has Frank Ellis anything to do with it," she asked.

"He may have. I don't know. It's been rumored about, and there are some detectives lurking around in the neighborhood," said the colonel, his voice full of doubt and caution.

"He is of a good family," said Adelaide thoughtfully, smoothing her work, "and I shouldn't think he'd care to engage in such business. It isn't honorable, is it?"

"Most of the boys consider it none of those northern officers' business what is done down here in the mountains," replied the colonel.

"But it's against the law, isn't it?"

"Yes, against their law; but our boys don't mind the Yankee law to any alarming extent."

"It would be better to let distilling alone anyway, I think, don't you?" exclaimed Adelaide, in a tone of such earnestness that her father could no longer evade the point.

"Oh, the business is not the best," he said, "but these revenue meddlers might find better employment themselves than going about to destroy the property of free men."

"But a man of Frank Ellis' standing and family—I should think he'd scorn so vulgar a business."

"There's a smack of daring and danger in it, and then, too, there is a great deal of money to be made," said Colonel Chenier, puffing rapidly at his pipe. "The Yankees ought to be willing for us to have at least one way of getting back what we've lost."

The sound of a horse's feet was now heard, and in a moment a cavalier of the true mountain type came up at a gallop and drew rein in front of the mill.

He lifted his broad brimmed felt hat and bowed to his horse's mane. He was a tall round limbed, compactly built young fellow, dark haired, with olive complexion and keen black eyes, regular features and a superbly poised head. A suit of well fitting gray clothes, with heavy top boots, brass spurs and buckskin gauntlets, to which were added a leather waist belt and three heavy pistols, gave strong emphasis to his rather brigandish bearing. At his right side swung a light Maynard rifle.

"Good morning, Miss Chenier; good morning, colonel," he said; then, as if for the first time noting the younger girl's presence, he bowed low again, and with a peculiarly pleasant smile added:

"Miss Rosalie, good morning."

"Lovely morning, isn't it?" said the colonel, the ring of southern cordiality in his heavy voice.

"Lovely, lovely," was the answer, in a rich, sweet tone. "I have had a charming ride over the mountain. The air is exceedingly fine and I have never seen vegetation so rich and rank. Why, the leaves on the hickory sprouts are as large as the skirts of my saddle."

"Those leaves will be immense when they are quite grown, Mr. Ellis," said Rosalie, striking a chord upon the old banjo.

The young man bowed and laughed lightly.

"I fear you are trying to spoil the effect of my comparison," he said, ending with a peculiar compression of the lips, which caused his heavy mustache to droop below his well turned chin.

"But your saddle skirts are so enormously large," Rosalie added. He looked down and seemed for the first time aware that he was riding one of those skirtless "trees," thousands of which had been left scattered through the hill country by Sherman's troopers. He laughed outright.

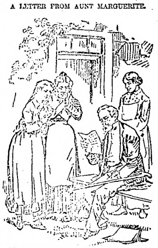
"I had forgotten that I changed saddles this morning," he exclaimed; "it wasn't a very happy comparison, after all, but the hickory leaves are just as large, all the same."

"I have a letter for you, sir," said the cavalier, searching in a side pocket as he spoke. He let the envelope fall in getting it out. Lightly swinging himself downward, he recovered it without dismounting. Although the horse was tall, the feat was performed with as much apparent ease as if he had stooped from a standing posture. He recovered his seat in the saddle with a romantic clang of spurs and pistols. The noble horse arched its neck and struck the ground impatiently with its left forefoot, scattering around a shower of sand and gravel.

The young man tossed the letter to Colonel Chenier, lifted his hat again, and with another low bow loosed the bridle rein and sped away up the valley at a slow gallop. Just around the first turn of the road they heard him begin to sing in a strong mellow voice a familiar old ballad. He left behind him, lingering in the air, a suggestion of mediaval days.

CHAPTER II.

A LETTER FROM AUNT MARGUERITE.



"It is a letter from Aunt Marguerite."

What is called the hill country of north Georgia consists of a network of mountain chains running in every direction, with fertile valleys between. Formerly it was the home of the Cherokee tribe of Indians, and for that reason is sometimes designated as Cherokee Georgia. Some great travelers, among them Bayard Taylor, have compared this region to the most picturesque parts of Italy as regards both climate and scenery. In many places the landscape is broken into the grandest alpine masses. Notably this is so in the more mountainous parts lying west of the Western and Atlantic railroad.

The little "pocket," in which for the present we linger with the slender beginnings of our history, lies in the very thickest of the hilly network, many hundred feet above the sea level, protected from great storms—a dreamy little eden of quietude and peace. The people of the region are, for the most part, simple, ignorant mountaineers, fifty years behind the age, independent, hardy, reticent, peculiar in dress and manner, but brave, honest and true to their traditions; in many respects not unlike the peasantry of the south of France. The men are great hunters, and you may see them stalking through the woods with the long flintlock rifles of a century past flung across their bony shoulders. They take to nothing new. With them progress is an unknown word. A few families here and there are cultured folk whom adversity or the pursuit of health has thrown into these primitive valleys. The lives of these cultured exiles is dry, lonely and eventless. The Chenier family is a good example. From month's end to month's end their existence is merely negative—that is, they are not dead. The old mill is not more humdrum in its rumbling and creaking than is the daily round through which they turn. The older ones have the sad satisfaction of remembering some days of glory, and they often talk over that happy time. Rosalie hears them; but it is like reading a romance. It charms her without rendering her discontented. She is imaginative, and often nurses that romantic dream, indefinite though it be, of one day roaming away, beyond the encircling mountains, into the great outside, the strong, joyous, rushing world.

If a letter is fascinating of itself, independent of anything it may contain, to us who live in the full tide of modern progress, what must it be to one in the deep seclusion of a place like the "pocket?" It is, until the seal is broken, a mysterious messenger from an unknown country.

Rosalie came down from her perch upon the broken wall, and approached her father as he began to tear open the envelope which had been thrown to him by the young horseman. It was as if she expected great tidings, a message of charming import from some benign and powerful personage far away somewhere, anywhere, in that romantic world beyond the mountains. The stir in her blood was of that obscurely tender sort which barely tinges contentment with longing or hope or indefinite desire.

"It is from Marguerite," said Colonel Chenier, as he slowly unfolded the heavy white unruled sheet covered over with small, cramped writing.

"Aunt Marguerite?" quickly inquired Adelaide, her face taking on a look of immediate rest.

Colonel Chenier's hand trembled as he adjusted his spectacles. A sort of ashen gravity momentarily deepened in his cheeks.

"Read it aloud, papa," cried Rosalie; "but wait, I'll call mamma," she added; and without a second's pause she ran into the mill and soon returned leading a pale, thin, fair faced woman, whose air was that of an energetic invalid.

"It is a letter from Aunt Marguerite," exclaimed Adelaide, as her mother sat down beside her. Rosalie remained standing, still holding the banjo in her left hand, her sweet lips slightly parted, her eyes beaming with all a child's sincere curiosity.

"She is coming to see us," said Colonel Chenier, lifting his eyes from the letter and looking into his wife's pale face, as if asking what she thought of the startling announcement.

"Oh, oh!" cried Rosalie, "coming here! Is she really coming here?"

"Coming here!" echoed Adelaide.

A little color rose into the transparent cheeks of Mrs. Chenier, but she remained silent.

"What can we ever do with her, papa?" said Adelaide almost petulantly.

"Oh, I'm so very glad," exclaimed Rosalie, her face emphasizing the statement with a quick flush. "Read it aloud to us."

Colonel Chenier looked over his glasses at the radiant girl, and then, turning back to the letter, began reading as follows:

SAVANNAH, GA., May 2.

MY DEAR BROTHER—I have at last determined to write to you again. Of course, I cannot imagine why you have not answered any of my letters. Certainly I filled even one of them with sisterly affection. Lately I have been nursing a fear that, since I sent a small remittance in the first one, five years ago, it

ECHOES OF THE RAPIDS

The school building begins to assume proportion, and its outline shows that it will be a grand structure. Sivigney & Co. are rushing the work with all possible speed.

The school will be made a High School this year. Prof. Rutherford it is said, has had experience in the evolution of a common school into a High School.

The hotels are rushed with business. An effort will be made to induce the company who were to build the company who were to build the $75,000 hotel at Crookston to locate here, as we have the people.

Dr. I. Tureut, who has made this city his home for the past year, took his departure for Minto, Dakota, yesterday morning, where he will remain. The Doctor is undoubtedly one of the best veterinary surgeons, and we are sorry to see him leave.

The Meehan drive of about 7,000,000, feet is at Thief River Falls.

R. W. Blyberg, with Fogleberg & Swank, contractors, went to Grand Forks Saturday to hunt up men. Several hundred men are wanted.

Mrs. John Leveck was over to Grand Forks this week to see her mother.

Cyprien Gosselin and family will occupy the residence portion of the Gosselin Main st building.

Ye editor drove to Thief River Falls Monday and returned yesterday in company with Jas. Meehan Sr. They came down the river from Thief River Falls in a boat.

John Bancroft, a man who was a tramp eight years ago, and who died recently at Portland, Ore., bequeathed all his property, estimated at $15,000, to a woman in Sacramento, Cal., who once gave him a night's lodging and breakfast and $1 besides, together with some good advice. Of course this tramp is only one in a million who would do anything of this kind.

This is plum season. The festive "kid" now has his eye on the orchards about town and needs watching. The following, from an exchange, gives a hint of a method that might be employed with good effect:

"Boo-hoo!"

"What's the matter, John?"

"Got caught stealin' plums at Mr. Binx's."

"Did he thrash you?"

"No; made me eat the plums. Boo-hoo-hoo!"

Chas. Hoerning, a brother of Mrs. W. A. Schreiter, arrived Saturday morning. He came up for sport among the prairie chickens.

Geo. Crocker was in the city Saturday, representing the Metzger medicine company of Minneapolis. Mr. Crocker was several years ago a resident of Crookston, and joint proprietor of the Crocker and Canday addition to St. Hilaire.

On Friday last Denis Lizotte, of Lake Pleasant township had his hand pierced through and through by the needle of his binder. When the accident occurred a team was hitched to the machine, and had to be unhitched; had the team started, a terribly lacerated hand would have resulted. The assistance of two others was required ere the hand was freed. Dr. Lemieux attended the man and says there was a hole clear through bone, sinew and all. Unless ulceration sets in the wound will soon be healed.

Mrs. Cyprien Gosselin went over to Grand Forks last week to submit to a surgical operation. Dr. Wheeler, by use of the knife, ascertained that she was suffering with cancer of the stomach, which has made such progress that any attempt to remove it would have been sure death. The cancer is necessarily fatal, and the end will come in a short time. Mrs. Gosselin was hitherto a strong woman, of unusually robust constitution. Her many friends here are heartsick over the sad affair. She will return as soon as she has recovered from the effects of the operation.

Mrs. C. W. Mead and children returned from a pleasant visit at Fairmont, Dakota, Monday.

Joe Ralph came over from West Superior Saturday to watch the boom. It is making Joseph Dizzy.

Jas. Meehan Jr. and wife drove to Crookston Friday.

P. Meehan is in the city, having returned Tuesday.

Hon. Marcus Johnson arrived Monday a. m.

Miss Rosa Zeh presided, as honorary guest, at a tea Saturday p. m., given in her honor by Mrs. J. W. Lowe. Miss Rosa's young lady friends were present, and a happy afternoon was passed.

Miss Rosa Zeh left for West Superior, Wis., Saturday evening, where she will remain several weeks visiting relatives.

Ovide Moreau drove over from Terrebonne Tuesday.

A reception was given in honor of Mr. and Mrs. J. S. McCornack at the residence of J. D. Marshall Friday evening, which proved a very pleasant affair.

Miss Eugenie La Freniere attended teachers institute at Crookston, returning Tuesday, when she at once drove to Terrebonne, to resume her duties in the school there. Misses Lena and Emma Sutter also attended from this place and all report the institute as very interesting, profitable and instructive.

Joe Paradis' horse is a proud stepper. He is a product of Terrebonne.

Wm. Zaiser returned Monday from the Red Lake country where he has been for the past couple of months.

Mr. and Mrs. John Crawford left for Burwell station Monday, where they will remain during the winter.

Mrs. John A. Duffy went to Minneapolis Saturday night to visit relatives and attend the fair and exposition.

Mead & Co. have applied for a license to sell liquor for the ensuing year. The saloon will be located on the North side.

John Fogleberg and family will occupy a residence on 5th st north.

Miss Elizabeth Q. Ralph is at present engaged in an art studio at Kansas City. Miss Ralph has developed great aptitude for painting portraits of all kinds, both from life and photographs. Miss Maria Ralph received last week three specimen portraits, two in crayon and one in water colors, that are unusually natural, with an artistic touch and finish. Miss Ralph's friends in this place are pleased to learn of her success.

Tuesday was a great event among local sportsmen, and the slaughter of prairie chickens was great. The day was auspicious at first, but pluvius poured forth his product toward evening, drenching every noble marksman who had ventured out. The game is not very plentiful this year, but a fair amount of pleasure can be derived from a day's sport.

The prairies were besieged Tuesday, dotted here, there and everywhere with hunting parties.

FRANK E. HUNT, P. M.

A hunting party of three (we won't mention names, though a dog by the name of "Goldie" and another setter from Wisconsin accompanied them) were returning to town Tuesday night, after spending the day demolishing several prairie chickens, having waited till dark. Reaching Badger Creek hill, the prancing steeds pranced too much and down went the buggy, sportsmen and all with a broken axel. The gentlemen of the party claim that they were too heavily loaded—with game, and the hill being somewhat rocky, uneven and steep the accident is no wonder. Darkness overhung all, and the search for a conveyance from neighboring farmers was a somewhat disagreeable task. They arrived home safely about 9:30, much less enthusiastic than when they started.

Mr. and Mrs. L. A. Kaufer returned Monday a. m.

FAR--FAR--AWAY.

What sight so lured him through the field he knew
As where green earth stole into heaven's own hue,
Far—far—away?

What sound was dearest in his native dells?
The mellow lin-lan-lone of evening bells
Far—far—away?

What vague world-whisper, mystic pain or joy,
Through these three words would haunt him when a boy
Far—far—away?

A whisper from his dawn of life? a breath
From some fair dawn beyond the doors of death
Far—far—away?

Far, far, how far? from o'er the gates of Birth,
The faint horizons, all the bounds of earth,
Far—far—away?

What charm in words, a charm no words could give?
O dying words, can music make you live
Far—far—away?
—Tennyson.

BILLY HAWTHORNE.

An Illinois Story.

He was 19 years old, was William Hawthorne, strong and active; rough at times, but good natured; a good entertainer, as boys entertain, and usually the hero in any adventure that developed one. Of course, he was known as "Billy," for who ever heard of a popular fellow whose christian name was William, who was not dubbed "Billy?"

Two miles and one-half southwest of the village of Wayoph, was the farm of which William Hawthorne, Sr., was the nominal owner and proprietor, but of which Billy was the sole and absolute boss. The farm comprised 640 acres of the best land in Grundy county, and was stocked by a herd of cattle of very superior grade. In fact, Hawthorne was known as one of the rich farmers of Grundy county, and he took great pride in popularizing this prevailing notion, by driving some very excellent horse-flesh, smoking cigars of superior brand, entertaining stockmen at his farm house in the most hospitable way, and conducting himself generally in a way to excite the comment of his neighbors and friends regarding resources which enabled him to live so well.

Billy partook of his father's nature. He, too, was fond of display, but when among his associates he seemed to be so richly entitled to all he assumed, that no one seemed to take offense.

Billy was one of these country boys with town tendencies. He might have been called amphidious, if that were not the least appropriate word that could have been applied to him. That is, he lived at home and bossed the farm, but at the same time was the leader in society in Wayoph, and his bay team and bugy with red running gears were the severest conditions with which the half dozen clerks who sold dry goods and groceries over the counters of the little stores in the village had to contend. To be sure, they had frequent evening parties, informal affairs, at which they did not encounter their country rival, but at all the more important gatherings, at picnics, moonlight rides and such like, Billy was always at hand and was always prince of the occasion.

It was he who first forded the stream of questionable depth that crossed the roadway leading to some picnic ground; it was he who always knew the road when others were at a loss; it was Billy who arranged the swing, assisted in spreading the luncheon in the most favorable place, rolled the lemons for lemonade, in fact, and this is the long and short of it. Billy was ever doing what the girls admired, and they admired it because he did it in a strong, free, good-natured way, always confident and usually successful in what he undertook.

In his control of the affairs of the farm there were times when the son and the father disagreed, and it was at such times that the high spirit of each asserted itself in a way that was inimical to peace and happiness. Of late, however, the misunderstandings had usually been settled by the unconditional capitulation of William Hawthorne, sr., and the consequent triumph of the spirited scion.

It might be said right here that Hawthorne's fortune had a string tied to it. True, it seemed as if he had always owned the land on which he lived, for he had come in possession of it long before Grundy county was organized and prior to the time of the location of a great majority of the farmers in that neighborhood. But the fact was that the title to the land had been somewhat obscured in its frequent transfers from seller to buyer, and even now, after Squire Hawthorne had been sowing and reaping on it for upwards of eighteen years, an absolutely authentic abstract of title had not been secured by him. The case of John Stiles vs. William Hawthorne et al. had appeared and reappeared on the court dockets, but the attorneys for the defense had always avoided an issue, and the attorneys for the prosecution were satisfied in that they had prevented the case from being outlawed. The last time the case had come up it had assumed a new shape, and indeed it seemed as if John Stiles might eventfully come in possession of the land from which Squire Hawthorne had drawn his wealth during the past eighteen years.

Now Billy did not have a legal mind, and he gave the long drawn litigation little thought. Enough for him that the farm was well stocked and he had horses to drive and money to spend. Do not understand that he was a spendthrift, or that he was indifferent to the welfare of the farm, but prosperity had abided with them so long, that Billy had come to regard it as a matter of course, and in that way he may have come to overlook some of the details of the business in the young, full life he was leading.

On the morning of Thanksgiving day of the year in which the events herein narrated occurred, Billy was in the large yard surrounding the barn, hitching his team of bays to his buggy.

His mother a portly woman of forty-five, was standing in the doorway of the house, looking toward him, shading her eyes with her hand. Finally she walked down to the little gate that led from the door-yard into the barn. "William," she called, "where are you going?"

"Going to town mother," replied Billy, attaching the last tug to the single-tree and gathering the reins preparatory to jumping into the buggy.

"Aint you going to eat Thanksgiving dinner with us?" asked the mother in a tone that indicated a fear that he was not.

"Yes, I'll be back in time for turkey all right enough, mother," and with this he was gone.

* * * * * * * *

The son kept his word with his mother and was back at the farm house a half-hour before dinner was announced, but he found the family in poor spirit for Thanksgiving day. William Hawthorne had just returned from Centerville, the county seat of Grundy county, where he had been attending court for the past seven days in the case of John Stiles vs. William Hawthorne et al.

"Well father, you back?" exclaimed Billy as he entered the room, "'spose you've laid that lawsuit on the shelf again for a couple of years."

"The arguments were closed last evening," responded the father, "and the judge has the matter under advisement. He is to render his decision this afternoon."

"Pshaw on his decision, I guess we're safe enough, "said the boy, pouring a glass of cider from a pitcher that stood on the side-board, and drinking it down.

"I don't know about that," returned Mr. Hawthorne, "things took a new turn this past week. Stiles' attorney had come into possession of some papers, which together with the records, may be sufficient to establish his right to the land."

But Billy had no patience with such talk. He had heard it ever since he had been a boy, so without replying or questioning further, he sat down to dinner with the family, only now and then offering a word, as the conversation regarding the last phase of the case of Stiles vs. Hawthorne.

That evening, Billy was at his best. As usual, he was the leader at the ball, gave directions as to the dances, instructed the musicians to what should be played, was consulted by other committeemen, and was the recipitent of many smiles and tokens from the girls who had occasion to remember, among other things, his team of bays and his new side-spring buggy.

Lou Whiting, who gloried in the honor of being Billy's "girl," was making the most of the privilege. She shared honors with her escort, and assumed an allowable air of superiority peculiar to village girls favored by desirable beaux. Lou was the daughter of Jim Whiting, a lawyer of some local prominence, who lived in Wayoph, but who had his office at Centreville, the county seat. It happened that Whiting was Stiles' attorney in the land suit against Hawthorne, that had been pending for so many years. There was no enmity between Hawthorne and Whiting on account of the latter's connection with the prosecution in the case, but naturally they were not very friendly toward each other. But this did not effect the relation, existing between Billy and Lou, indeed, it is doubtful whether the girl had ever given the law suit a second thought, until on this evening of the dance.

The hours were gliding by, and it was nearly twelve o'clock. The dancers in Thorn's hall, the scene of the ball were just repairing into a large unoccupied room at the rear, where an oyster supper was awaiting them.

Billy and Lou led the column and as they came to the tables and were about to be seated, Billy suggested boisterously that somebody ask a blessing and loudly repeated a sentence or two by way of assistance in getting started to any one who would volunteer. Now, whatever may have been the shortcomings of the young people at Wayaph in the way of proprieties. They had been brought up in the religion of their mothers and were strict in the homely observance of all the religious manners that had been taught them. And Billy was one of these, so when he uttered those mock words of prayer, he surprised and shocked the company.

"What 'cher looking so sober about?" exclaimed Billy, when he saw how his jest was received; "here, Lou, you've got to do it," and he seized the girl's hands and tried to fold them over her plate, as it in prayer. Some of the boys laughed, but the girls were dumbfounded. Some recovered and commenced to expostulate with Billy, others left the table, but Billy became more talkative, more boisterous, until it was plain to everybody that he was under the influence of liquor. One after another the girls drifted out of the room, and the boys gathered about the fallen hero and endeavored to humor him into sobriety. As the girls stood in little groups about the dancing hall, discussing the awful predicament in which they were in' and while the boys were yet applying themselves to Billy in the improvised oyster parlor, Hawthorne's hired man came bursting into the room, calling loudly for his young master, at the same time shouting excitedly that Hawthorne's big cattle barn was afire. Billy heard the words and recognized the voice of Carlson, and in three minutes he was the soberest man in the assembly. Calling to Lou he told her he must go home at once, and asked if she wished to go now, or wait until the dance was over and then go home with one of his friends. The strangeness of his intoxication (for he had never been drunk before) was no stranger than his rapid recovery. The excitement occasioned by the announcement of fire had overcome the effects of the liquor, and Billy was wholly himself again.

Lou was ready to go, for who wanted to remain and dance under the double depression brought upon the company, first by Billy's conduct and next by the calamity on the Hawthorne farm.

It was a ten minute's drive from Thorn's hall to the Whiting residence, and just as they pulled up at the front gate, Jim Whiting, Lou's father, was about to ascend the steps, having just returned by carriage from Centerville, where he had waited to hear the decision of the judge of the supreme court, in the case of Stiles vs. Hawthorne.

"This you?" asked Whiting, as Billy and Lou came up the walk.

"Oh, papa, how you scared me," exclaimed his daughter, as she disengaged her arm, and ran toward her father.

"Billy, I presume you know that a decision was to be rendered to-day in your father's case," said Whiting, as the young man was about to return in haste to the buggy.

"Well, how did it come out?"

"I'm afraid it has gone against him," said Whiting, but here he was interrupted by Lou, "Oh, papa, do you know that Mr. Hawthorne's barn burned down, and Billy is hurrying home now?" and amid expressions of profound regret on the part of Whiting, and sympathetic words from Lou, Billy hastened to the buggy and was off.

Hawthorne's cattle barn had indeed been destroyed, together with fifty-four head of blooded stock, including seventeen imported horses. The loss, including the building and all the contents was estimated at $10,000, with not a cent of insurance.

Billy looked over the smoldering remains with a heavy heart. Mr. Hawthorne, sr., was assuming a very brave front, but he knew too well that the loss would cripple him helplessly.

On the following day he received a letter from his attorney which confirmed what Whiting had told Billy the night before, but which the boy had not yet told.

The attorney held out the hope that the case could be appealed, but that it would be a costly experiment. Added to this, the incident of Billy's drunk at the dance on Thanksgiving night, found its way into the Hawthorne family, and it seemed as if the once proud household would be crushed under the triple calamity.

And it was even so, The land case was perpetuated and is still pending, but the expense of the litigation has become a heavy draw upon the now slender income of the farm.

The set back received by the loss of the barn and stock was never made up, and now parts of the farm are rented out, only about one-third of it being tilled by Hawthorne. And Billy—he never regained his place as a local hero. His break at the Thanksgiving dance brought him into disfavor with many of the anxious mammas, and made him more vulnerable to the attacks of his rivals. He could no longer ride behind a spanking team of bays, nor could he indulge himself in other of his whilom pastimes and pleasures. Gradually he dropped out of the society of Wayoph, and after two years of decline, went to Montana, and his going caused no comment. The Hawthorne family had suffered a collapse.

Tremendous Force of Sea Waves.

Some idea of the power exerted by sea waves may be formed from the following facts: An iron column, twenty-three feet long and weighing 6,000 pounds—part of a lighthouse being built—was, in course of operation, landed at Bishop Rock, England, and, a storm coming up, was left lashed by a chain at each end to two strong eye bolts. Three days after, when the storm had abated, it was found that the great column had been moved a distance of twenty feet and landed on top of a projecting rock. A blacksmith's anvil weighing nearly 200 pounds, and sunk in a pit three and one-half feet deep, had been washed entirely out of the sink and landed near the column of iron above mentioned. It had been floated nearly 200 feet after being lifted out of the hole.—St. Louis Republic.

HE COWED THE AUDIENCE.

An Actor Who Was Hissed Removes His Mask and Cries for Revenge.

'Tis seldom that an actor is hissed, but recently the patience of an Albany audience gave way, and the soul-stirring efforts of two mediocre actors not long-since received well-merited hisses, according to the Argus of that city. For a moment the artists were dumb, then one of them, advancing to the footlights, said in tremulous tones: "Friends, I'm sorry. We've done the best we could to amuse you. We've thrown ourselves about the stage and worked hard, and is this the return we got?" He stopped for a moment. Then his anger and resentment overmastered him. "This is the first time," said he, in a ringing tone, "that the American Macks have ever been hissed. I'm sorry that you show such little courtesy to a fellow man, but if there is any one among you," he cried, tearing off the beard and wig, revealing the close cropped head and square jaws of a prize fighter, "who wishes to back up what he did let him step up here."

The nerve of the man captured the audience. Those who had hissed him now cheered and applauded. They admired the pluck of the man. The applause emboldened him, and as he threw aside his coat he called again for any person in the audience to meet him, but he must have a parting shot, and as he turned to leave the stage he yelled: "If any of you want to see me after the performance is over you will find me at the entrance!" But no one saw him. His brutality captured more applause than his acting.

AMMONIA OR ALUM

Baking Powders.

HOW TO DETECT THEM.

Ammonia and alum are the most common adulterants used in the manufacture of baking powders. The Government report shows that a large percentage of the baking powders on the market contain either one or the other or both these pernicious drugs. Ammonia particularly is in very general use.

This wholesale use in an article of daily food, of one of the most injurious poisons is simply criminal. Slow ammonia poisoning produces diseases of the stomach and is particularly injurious to the complexion. The presence of ammonia in a baking powder, however can easily be detected.

TO DETECT AMMONIA.

Mix one heaping teaspoonful of baking powder with one teaspoonful of water in a tin cup; boil thoroughly for a few moments stir to prevent burning and if ammonia is present you can smell it in the rising steam, or place a can of the suspected powder top down on a hot stove for a minute or two then take off the cover and smell.

TO DETECT ALUM.

Alum powder can be tested by putting a couple of teaspoonfuls of the powder in a glass of cold water. If no efferevescence that is bubbling or simmering, takes place, condemn the goods and return them at once.

Dr. Price's Cream Baking Powder is reported by all authorities as free from alum, ammonia, or any other adulterant.

Fruits In Summer.

Contrary to the popular notion, the free use of good, ripe fruit in summer does not tend to give rise to bowel trouble. It really tends to prevent it. Fruits when rightly indulged, are easy of digestion; they promote the health of the organs which dispose of them, and keep the intestinal canal free and open. Of course unripe or spoiled fruits are a menace, and liable to excite summer complaint; but beyond a doubt, this is far the most often caused by milk and meats that have undergone poisonous changes.

The fact is universally recognized that flesh of all kinds decomposes very rapidly on keeping in hot weather. It cannot be as well known that the same kinds of food also decompose more quickly within the body during that season than they do in cold weather. The poison which results from decomposition acts powerfully, both as an emetic and a purgative; in a word, it causes severe cholera morbus. Fortunately, the liver is able to destroy some of the poison. There is however, a limit to such power; and if too much enters or is generated with the system, the liver cannot turn back, but some passes into the general circulation, where it does serious mischief. To forego meats entirely, and live upon fruits, vegetables and farinaceous foods, is the wisest and safest plan to follow during the hot season.—Boston Journal of Health.

A Would-Be Joker Squelched.

Been a deacon in a church for fifteen years?" echoed the passenger in the check suit. "That's a long time. I dare say you have passed the contribution basket through the congregation a great many times."

"Hundreds of times," replied the passenger in black alpaca.

"And I suppose—ha!—ha!—you have found a great many—eh?—what's this?"

The deacon, with an intensely weary look on his face, had drawn from his pocket and was holding out for inspection of the man in the check suit a time-stained card, on which was printed in large letters the following inscription:

"Never found in the contribution-box a button of any sort or kind in my life."—Star Sayings.

An Indian Camp Surprised.

On the 25th of May, 1889, news was received at Fort Buford, North Dakota, where I am stationed, that a band of Indians had crossed the Canadian line and were moving toward the Missouri River, and apparently expecting to cross near the junction of the two Missouris. At 9 o'clock that evening our troops were ordered to hold themselves in readiness to march at a moment's notice. And rations were issued and saddles packed, and every man ready to mount, except saddling his horse, in a short time. But we were held in suspense until about 4 o'clock the next afternoon. Then Capt. Sprole was ordered to take thirty picked man and scout the country lying along the river between our fort and Berthold Agency. I was one of these men, and we scouted for several days, covering a section of country 125 miles long by fifty wide without seeing an Indian. Rations were giving out and one evening we were about to start from home, when a friendly Indian came into camp, and told us a band of Indians had crossed the river about eight miles above. They had used his boat for crossing and had left it on the opposite bank, and he wanted the soldiers to help him get it back. This they readily promised to do, not so much, I must confess, from a desire to see his property returned to him, as from a hope that getting the boat might help them to a chance of getting the Indians. Scouts were sent out to ascertain the truth of this statement, and at 10 o'clock one of them returned with the information that the Indians were camped near the spot where they had left the boat. Soon every man was in his saddle on his way, going at a stiff gallop. But after riding two miles along the open road, we took to the timber and followed a narrow, crooked tail for about six miles more. This brought us to the bank of the river nearly opposite the Indian camp. A halt was made and a short consultation held, and it was decided that one of our best swimmers should swim the river, get the boat and row it around a bend three miles up, where the rest of the men would meet him. Everything worked well and all the men, excepting a small party left behind to guard the horses, were across the river by half past 2 o'clock. There were twenty-eight of them and half of them were ordered to approach the Indian camp from one side and half from the other. The movement was made in good order and when within a few hundred yards of the camp the men were deployed as skirmishers and silently advanced until only about a hundred yards separated them from the enemy, and and at daylight the camp was entirely surrounded, much to the surprise of the Indians, who thought they were safe when they got across the river and kept the boat on their side. They saw at once that they were in a trap and did not show fight, although the chief refused to surrender, saying that he had lived a long time, and fought a great many battles, and had never surrendered and never would. He would not give his arms, and when told that they would be taken from him by force, he drew a long knife and plunging it into his left side, fell to the ground. The others gave up their arms, and we got them all across the river by 5 o'clock that evening. There were thirty-three in the band, including some women and children, and they had with them thirty ponies. We had supper as soon as we reached the place where we had left our horses, consisting of bacon, hardtack and coffee. And as we had been without food for twenty-four hours, you may believe it tasted good. The Indians had evidently been on short rations, too, for the way they ate that bacon raw and swallowed the hardtack in great pieces was a sight to see.—Cor. Detroit Free Press.

Wolves in Pennsylvania.

The law authorizes the payment of $8 in Pennsylvania for the scalp of every wolf killed in the state, but not for a good many years has a wolf-scalp been offered for the bounty until last week, when the county authorities of Potter county received one from a woodman named Casey. He said he had killed the wolf at Grey's clearing, on the head waters of Pine creek, near the deep wilderness known as Dark forest. He was staying all night at Grey's cabin, when he was awakened by a great commotion in Grey's cowpen. He and Grey seized their guns and rushed out doors, suspecting that a bear was the cause of the uproar. The cow was bellowing loudly, and as the men approached the log inclosure they saw that she was being attacked by half a dozen animals which they thought were dogs. Casey took aim at one and fired and Grey also fired. The one Casey shot fell to the ground. The others fled to the woods, howling as they went. The animal Casey shot was found to be a wolf, an animal that every one believed was long ago extinct in the state. The cow was badly torn by the teeth of the wolves and she soon would have fallen a victim to the ravenous pack. Casey says that hunters have been out after the rest of the pack for several days but have not found any trace of them. The county authorities paid the $8 for the scalp and it will be mounted and hung in the commissioner's office as a curiosity.—New York Sun.

"Right about face!" as the man said when he asked his friend to publish a treatise on physiognomy.

It is a great pleasure to watch the self binders cutting down the golden grain, and watch the smile on the happy farmer's face as he thinks of all the good he can do with the money he derives from this year's crop. Although the crop is the best we ever had in Towner county, not a kernel will be purposely wasted. And this is proper for it is by saving we make, and if a farmer can save by shipping his grain he would be very foolish if he did not. If he has 5,000 bushels of wheat to sell and saves five cents a bushel by shipping it, it would make him $250. We know of farmers that shipped their grain last year and got 20 cents a bushel more than they could have got here. Last year we shipped to Woodward & Company, of Minneapolis, and every time got good prompt returns.

Happiness depends upon the prudent constitution of the habits.

99 per cent. of those investing in Real Estate make money. 87 per cent. of those investing in Business lose money.

A commercial center is the safest place to invest in real estate, especially when such place is a great railway center; has good river transportation and large foreign and domestic shipping. Portland is that place.

Portland, Oregon, is now preeminently the commercial center of the Pacific Northwest. No other city in the United States is so well situated in respect to natural resources as is Portland, and it leads all other cities west of the Mississippi River in its phenomenal growth in population. Located at the confluence of two great rivers, and being the terminus of more transcontinental railways than any other city in the United States. In fact, every advantage which insures the solid growth and prosperity of a city is abundantly enjoyed by Portland.

These Advantages Guarantee Constantly Increasing Values in Real Estate.

CONTORTIONS OF THE FACE.

Noses and Other Features Distorted by the Force of Habit.

"Did you ever take notice how commonly addicted people are to making faces?" said a philosopher at the Cosmos club to a writer for the Washington Star. "Observe the persons you meet in the course of any day and you will hardly find one of ten who is not more or less given to grimacing incidentally to conversation. Some screw their mouths up in an unnatural way, others constantly wrinkle their foreheads, and so on with all sorts of absurd and unnecessary distortions of feature. Habits of this sort are very undesirable, not only because they are ugly, but also for the reason that they make wrinkles and permanently affect the expression. Often do I see a really pretty girl actually make herself hideous for the moment by a facial contortion which is intended to signify intense interest, emphasis, surprise or what not. This is the age of nerves, and nothing is more readily acquired than such nervous tricks as these. They ought not to be permitted."

"But how prevent them?"

"I would suggest that in every family the members should take notice of such little tricks in one another and correct them by gentle suggestion. I have found that method entirely successful in my own household. Habits of the kind are usually altogether unconscious, and the victim is likely to be glad of a means of correction. It is wonderful how they grow upon one, and it is the easiest thing in the world to acquire them from others by sympathetic imitation. The sort of mutual suggestion I speak of among members of a family does not partake of the spirit of unamiable criticism which I have seen exhibited in so many domestic establishments, where ungentle comments are bandied about regarding the features and other physical attributes of this one and that."

"Particularly noses."

"Yes, noses always seem to be a topic of dispute in households. The feature is the most conspicuous and is subject to the greatest eccentricities of shape. Did you ever notice how few persons' nasal organs are set straight upon their faces? Walk along F street or Pennsylvania avenue with an observing eye and you will see that very nearly all the people you meet have noses that are twisted to one side. But the most curious thing is that 900 out of every 1000 noses are inclined in the same direction—namely to the right. As well as I can make out, our noses are to a considerable extent what we make them. No two people use their handkerchiefs in quite the same manner. A, whose nose is a decided snub, habitually wipes it skyward, while B encourages the downward inclination of his proboscis with vigorous pulls at the end. They do this quite unconsciously, but the repetition of the operation many times a day from early childhood must gradually affect the contour of the part as the fleshy tissues and cartilage grow and harden.

"I once knew an old lady whose children had all of them remarkably shaped noses, and she asserted that she had made them what they were by pinching the organs often during babyhood to prevent them from spreading. You will notice that the victim of catarrhal trouble is likely to have a nose with a slightly bulbous extremity, the result of unmerciful tweakings, and so it is with every one who abuses this useful gift of nature, the deformity corresponding with the style of torture to which the nose is subjected. The almost invariable inclination of the nose to the right is presumable due, as I was told, to the practice of manipulating the smelling apparatus with the right hand. So, you see, if we are not to reconcile ourselves to crooked noses we must be careful how we pull them and cultivate from early youth a convenient ambidextrousness in the use of the mouchoir.

Objections to Cremation.

The archbishop of Paris has issued instructions to his clergy commanding them to condemn the practice of cremation, which he regards as the "triumph of materialism over religious spiritualism." M. Earnest Renan thinks that this pastoral letter is in conformity with true Christian doctrine. He points out that the great dread of the early christians was lest their bodies should be torn by wild beasts or burned after their death.

"For myself," adds M. Renan, "as I do not believe in the resurrection of the body as the dogma of the church describes it, it matters very little to me in what way my body may be disposed of when I am dead. Whether it be burned or buried, or consumed by the birds of the air or the beasts of the field is to me a matter of the most complete indifference. My objection to cremation is that it must be very painful to the survivors. Burial is sad enough; but how much sadder is burning?"

FLYING FISH.

It Seems Now That They Really Do Fly Like Fowls.

There has been much argument on the subject of the flight of so-called "flying fishes," says the St. Louis Republic, some eminent naturalists holding that true flight is peculiar to fowls and insects, and that the motion of this piscatorial curiosity is closely allied to that of the flight of "flying lizards," "flying squirrels," etc., being simply a single long sweep. At present, however, the weight of the evidence seems to favor the theory of true flight. C. O. Whitman, in an article in the American Naturalist, demonstrates from actual observation that, in the language of Rev. Mr. Jasper, "flying fish do fly." The observations upon which Mr. Whitman bases his very interesting and detailed account were taken during a voyage from San Francisco to Yokohama, Japan. After carefully noting the movements of flying fishes from the start to the finish, Prof. Whitman does not hesitate to pronounce the motion "true and graceful flight." Prof. D. S. Jordan has also carefully examined the flight of Exocoetus Californicus. Exo is the flying fish of Southern California, and is one of the most agile of its species. Prof. Jordan says that his most trustworthy observations were taken early in the morning when both air and water were free from motion. He says: When the fish rises from the water the movements of the tail are continued for some seconds, even after the whole body is out of water. While the tail is in motion the pectoral fins are in a state of very rapid vibration, the ventrals being closed or folded. When the action of the tail ceases the pectorals and ventrals are spread, and, as far as we can see, held at rest. When the fish begins to fall, the tail touches the water and the motion of the pectorals recommences, thus enabling the fish to resume its flight. In some instances Prof. Jordan noticed that the distance covered by the flight was upwards of a quarter of a mile.

The Judgment.

Thou hast done evil
And given place to the Devil;
Yet so cunningly thou concealest
The thing which thou feelest,
That no eye espieth it,
Satan himself denieth it.
Go where it chooseth thee,
There is none that accuseth thee;
Neither foe nor lover
Will the wrong uncover;
The world's breath raiseth thee
And thy own past praiseth thee.

Yet know thou this:
At quick of thy being
Is an eye, all-seeing,
The snake's wit evadeth not,
The charmed lip persuadeth not;
So thoroughly it despiseth
The thing thy hand prizeth,
Tho' the sun were thy clothing,
It should count thee for nothing.
Thine own eye divineth thee,
Thine own soul arraigneth thee;
God himself cannot shrive thee
Till that judge forgive thee.

The Secret of Fine Pastry.

Is wholly in using Dr. Price's Cream Baking Powder. The only pure Cream Tarter Powder sold on the market. Other brands contain either ammonia, alum or some other adulterant. Ammonia or alum powders dry out, make the dough too porous, leaving a bitter taste, etc.

No agency has assisted so much toward perfection in cookery as Price's Cream Baking Powder. Its ingredients are simple and so blended as to exist in exact chemical proportions, so after use there is never any excess of either left in the food. Hence there can be no impurities whatever left in the finished food. No bitter taste, no taint of ammonia, but food raised with Dr. Price's Cream Baking Powder partakes of the natural sweet flavor of the flour and keeps moist and fresh for days. This powder possesses qualities peculiar to it alone. No other makes such delicious pastry. No other contains the white of eggs.

THE CRAZY STUDENT.

Ghastly Story of the Killing of a Boy by an Insane Brother.

The correspondent of the Rochester Union and Advertiser, writing from Alexander, N. Y., regarding a haunted house in that locality, tells this bloodcurdling story:

A little over twenty years ago there lived in this village a gentleman, his wife and two boys—James, aged eighteen, and Henry, aged twenty. These boys were bright, scholarly young gentlemen, and were devotedly attached to each other. A year before this story opens they had begun the study of medicine and were both enthusiastic students. Henry was passionately bevoted to the study of the heart, especially its anatomy and physiology, and frequently expressed a desire to witness its beatings. He claimed that if he could watch the movement of that organ he would be able to cope successfully with any of its diseases. This thought haunted him night and day; it soon became the sole object of his conversation, the one theme upon which he expended every leisure moment. At last it told upon his health; his appetite became affected; his nights were passed without sleep; his friends began to notice a strangeness in his manners, still no premonition of the awful event about to take place reached them.

One night the father and mother of the boys left them at home and went to visit a neighbor. They were seated in their study room busily engaged with their books when Henry suddenly sprang to his feet, and pacing back and forth, began his usual harangue on the subject of the heart. Back and forth he went, his manner growing more wild and incoherent at every turn. Suddenly he stopped in front of his brother, and with the wild light of insanity shining in his eyes, and his face convulsed with maniacal rage, shouted: "Your heart shall furnish me with the knowledge I want!" and then sprang like a tiger upon him. The struggle was short but terrible and ended by James being thrown to the floor unconscious, his head having struck the corner of a table in falling. Upon regaining his senses a few moments after he found himself bound upon a table, his chest bared, and at his side the sponges, knives and other instruments used in bloody operations. He had scarcely noticed these ghastly preparations when his brother stepped to his side, arrayed in the surgeon's long, white apron and holding in his hand a bright, keen scalpel. The sight of his brother's heart beating against its covering of flesh aroused him to fury. He laughed and shrieked and waved his sharp knife above his head in triumph.

"At last," he cried, "I shall see it beat and throb. I shall learn the secret of its rhythm, and understand the mystery of its music." The poor lad begged and pleaded for mercy, but in vain. Slowly and with cool precision the maniac placed the edge of his knife upon the spot where he wished to cut, and in spite of his brother's pitiful cries drew the cold steel through the quivering flesh. Once, twice he cut through flesh and muscle, and then there was the sudden rush of feet, a crash, and through the open door rushed the boy's father, accompanied by several neighbors.

In the struggle that followed the maniac was fatally cut by his own knife and died a few hours later.

The boy on the table was in a dying condition when released, and only lived long enough to give the details of the scene just described. As before stated, strong efforts were made to keep the affair quiet, and a few weeks after the parents left Alexander, never to return.

A Successful Man.

One of the brightest advertising men in Chicago made his rise through the fall of another. It was some years ago when as a mere boy he was tramping the streets of Chicago in search of any sort of a job which offered. His last nickel had gone for food, and one afternoon he was walking through a down town alley, tired and disgusted. Happening to glance upward he saw a boy leaning out of a window. In a moment the boy lost his balance and fell to the ground with the customary dull, sickening thud. The discouraged man hastened to the boy's side and discovered that death had been instantaneous. Looking up at the open window from which he had fallen the man counted the stories and then sought the stairway near by. Mounting the stairs he dashed into the editor's room, for it was the office of The Prairie Farmer, and blurted out: "Do you want a boy?" Looking up in surprise the editor answered, "No, we have a boy." Then the man said, "I'll bet you haven't—your boy just fell from the window and is dead. I want his place." Investigation found that the man was right, and he was engaged for his pushing way. Since then he has risen by degrees and made money, and very few of his friends know how he gained his place. —Chicago Herald.

Mrs. Todd, the wife of the Amherst astronomer who has gone to Africa to observe the eclipse, helped her husband greatly in his preparations. She read every book concerning the coast to which the expedition was going, and read him selected passages daily. She also worked up formulas and details of geography for him.

And whate'er your lot may be,
Paddle your own canoe."

"To yourself be true," "and thou can't not then be false to any man." "Self-love is not so vile a sin as self-neglecting." Then "be wise to-day, 'tis madness to defer." Get Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery, for all affections of the lungs and throat. It is likewise a wonderful liver tonic, and invigorator.

All the year round, you may rely upon Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery. It's not like the sarsaparillas, that are said to be good for the blood in March, April and May. The "Discovery" works equally well at all times, and in all cases of blood-taints, or humors, no matter what their name or nature. It cures al Skin, Scalp and Scrofulous affections, as Eczema, Tetter, Salt-rheum, Fever-sores, White Swellings, Hip-joint disease and kindred ailments.

It's the cheapest blood-purifier, sold through druggists, because you only pay for the good you get.

Your money is returned if it doesn't benefit or cure you.

FAMOUS FOR AN HOUR.

A Case of Mistaken Identity Makes a Man Famous.

It is not often that a nonentity is mistaken for a notability for several days. Yet that is what happened quite recently at a small watering place in upper Austria. All of a sudden the town was convulsed with the delightful intelligence that Girardi, the famous Viennese comedian, was in its midst. A charity concert was in process of organization, and forthwith a deputation waited on the great man to solicit his assistance. It was graciously accorded and the deputies withdrew in high feather, one of them remarking how strange it was that an actor should have so fine a beard. "Why, don't you know," replied an omniscient colleague, "that actors always let their beards grow in the holidays?" On the eventful night the concert room was packed to suffocation and a vigorous round of applause greeted the appearance of the famous actor. What followed may best be described in the words of the Vienna News: "Instead of the excruciating funny song expected by the public Herr Girardi began a sentimental ditty in a very hoarse tone of voice. This rather astonished the audience at first, but they rapidly came to the conclusion that it must be a first-rate imitation of some opera singer. The object of the mimicry they did not know but they roared with laughter all the same." Girardi was encored and sang a romantic Italian aria, and once more the audience was convulsed at the subtelty of the imitation. Next morning it happened that the official visitors' list was published, from a perusal of which it appeared that, barring a certain Samuel Girardi, described as "merchant," nobody of that name was stopping in the town. The actor's name being Alexander, the extent of the blunder was soon apparent.—London Globe.

THE BUTCHER OF PALMYRA.

Why That Title Was Given to the Late Gen. McNeil.

Gen. John McNeil, who dropped dead in St. Louis a few days ago, was known as the "Butcher of Palmyra," a name given him for his slaughter of prisoners at Palmyra, Mo., in 1862. He was born in Halifax, Nova Scotia, in 1814, learned the hatter's trade in Boston, was in business in New York, and came West to St. Louis. At the breaking out of the war he responded to the call for troops, and was elected colonel of a regiment of the reserve corps.

In 1862 he was placed in command of a cavalry regiment and ordered to Northeast Missouri to operate against Sterling Price. In October, 1862, Andrew Alsman was taken prisoner and carried off by a band of guerillas. Col. McNeil arrested ten of the most important people of Palmyra, and without a trial of any kind ordered them shot to death. One of these victims was a lad about 17 years old, and all of them were non-combatants. The stain of this atrocity clung to him all his life, though he claimed to be acting under orders from Gen. Halleck and Gen. Schofield. When news of this bloody affair reached Richmond, ten Federal colonels were ordered held as hostages, and a demand was made on the United States for the surrender to the Confederacy of McNeil to be tried for inhuman warfare. He was never given up and the colonels were released. McNeil served through the war and fought with distinction, but was always under the cloud of the Palmyra butchery.

Since the war McNeil has been in politics, but never elected to any office, though often a candidate. He has held many appointive offices, however.—Cincinnati Enquirer.

$25.00 HARNESS FOR $16.50

IN GENUINE RUBBER $18.50.

DESCRIPTION OF HARNESS.

A fine Buggy Harness stitched twelve stitches to the inch, except traces which are stitched ten. Is made to represent a $30 harness. It has a 3 or 3½ [illegible] leather pad saddle, with covered seat and jockeys; is made from fine stock. Bridle is of usual dimensions, has fine blinds, nice leather front and beautiful rosettes with glass centers, nice nickel bit. Check-rein, either overdraw with nose piece, or side check. Nice russet or black reins. The breast-collar, neck-strap, breeching and turn folds are made either of patent enamel or plain harness leather as preferred and the layers on the same are cut wide and straight, and being stitched so very fine and nicely creased, give to the harness a costly custom-made appearance. The hip and back straps are doubled and stitched, nicely creased and finished throughout. Boxloops of beautiful design as on custom-made work. Trimmings either Davis Rubber, Nickel Wire or Brass Wire, or a Fancy style. We refer you to the publishers of this paper as to our responsibility. Remit by Express or Money Order. Money refunded if goods are not satisfactory.

YOU WANT

a San Francisco paper and of course you want a good one. The WEEKLY EXAMINER fills the want completely, for it is the best. It gives you every week not only all the news, but the best literary and miscellaneous matter published on the American continent—that is its specialty; being the best. It wants your subscription—yours particularly—and offers not only to you, but to every other subscriber, one or more attractive premiums.

In the first place, it gives every subscriber, one of the four magnificent etchings or paintings described below, and delivers it safely at his address, postage paid.

"The Retreat from Moscow," by Meissonier,
"The Roman Chariot Race," by A. Wagner.

Each of these pictures is 21x28 inches, and they are elegantly reproduced in fac simile, showing every tint and color of the great originals, either one of which could not be purchased for $100,000.

"Women and Children First," by C. Napier Hemy,
"Christ Leaving the Prætorium," by Gustave Doré.

Each of these pictures is reproduced in photogravure, size 21x28, and eminently fitted for framing, and will adorn the walls of the most refined house.

Each subscriber has the choice of any one of these four pictures, which will be mailed him in a tube direct from the EXAMINER office, as soon as the subscription is received.

In the second place, it will give 5,000 premiums, valued in the aggregate at about $125,000 to its subscribers this year. If there are 50,000 subscribers, one in ten will get one of these premiums; if there are 100,000, only one in twenty. But no matter how many there are, each and every one of these premiums—which range in value from 50 cents to $6,000—will be given absolutely without cost to some of those who have paid $1.50 for the WEEKLY EXAMINER for one year. The EXAMINER is thoroughly responsible, as you know, or as Wells, Fargo & Co. or any bank or commercial agency in San Francisco will assure you, and the leading men of the city will see that its premiums are distributed exactly as agreed and that every subscriber no matter where he is located, will receive just what is assigned to him.

Of course you want your home paper also, and you can just as well as not save a little money by taking the EXAMINER with it. The price of the WEEKLY EXAMINER is $1.50 per year, including the premium picture and your share of the $125,000 list of premiums, which are fully described in the twelve page Premium Supplement, which will be sent free on application to Improved Passenger Service.

Under the new time schedule of "the North-Western Line," C., St. P., M. & O. Ry., all passenger trains of this line make the trip between St. Paul and Chicago in less than 14 hours.

The Pullman and Wagner Vestibuled Limited, leaving St. Paul at 7:30 p. m. makes the trip to Chicago in 13½ hours and from Chicago to St. Paul in 13 hours and 25 minutes.

The Daylight Express leaving St Paul at 7:45 a. m. makes the trip to Chicago in 13 hours and 50 minutes and from Chicago to St. Paul in 13 hours and 45 minutes.

This is the only line running all its trains in less than 14 hour between St. Paul and Chicago, and while this time is quick trains don't have to run at as high speed to make their time as on other lines, because this is shorter than any other line.

In addition to these facts this is the only line by which connections are assure in Chicago with all fast line trains from Chicago to the East and South in the morning and at night.

A Canard.

The New York Press exposes that "Im-Important Bill" business.

The article credited to the New York Press going the rounds of the papers, in which it is alleged that unfavorable action has taken in the New York Legislature against the Royal Baking Powder proves to have been a canard gotten up and circulated by opposition baking powder makers for purposes quite apparent to every one.

The Pres N.Y.s, in exposing the fraud says: "No such legislation as that stated this article has ever been had in this State—or in any legislation to our knowledge." The lie is made from whole cloth. The Press disclaims any responsibilty for the publ cation and objects to being made a party to such methods adopted by some bakingpowder mantfacturers in their efforts to substitute their goods for others now in use.

What is a Model Wife.

Ladies' Home Journal: A model wife is the woman in whom the heart of her husband doth safely trust.

She is the woman who looks after his household, and makes her hospitality a delight to him and not a burden.

Who has learned that a soft answer will turn away wrath.

Who keeps her sweetest smiles and most loving words for her husband.

Who is his confidant in joy or in sorrow, and who does not feel the necessity of explaining her private affairs to the neighborhood.

Who respects the rights of her husband and children, and in return has due regard paid to her.

Who knows that the strongest argument is her womanliness, and so she cultivates it.

Who is sympathetic in joy or in griet and who finds work for her hands to do.

Who makes friends and keeps them.

Who is not made bitter by trouble but who strengthens and sweetens under it.

Who tries to conceal the faults of her husband rather than blazon them forth to an uninterested public,

The woman whose life-book has love written on every page.

Who makes a home for a man; a home in a house and in a heart. A home that he is sure of, a home that is full of love presided over by one whose price is above rubies.

She is the model wife.

By Our Great River.

"So blue yon winding river flows,
It seems an outlet from the sky
Where, waiting till the west wind blows
The freighted clouds at anchor lie."

There is and always has been something about rivers fascinates mankind. All poets, from Homer down, have sung their praises. The ancient Egyptian worshiped the Niles as a god. The earlest settlements were made along the banks of rivers becaus they afforded means of easy transport Most of the great cities of the world even Chicago with its odorous steam. The most delightful Journeys are those that lead by the banks of rivers. And so for those who appreciate lovely river scenery, "The Burlingeon," following the east bank of our grert Mississippi favorite line between Chicago or St Louis and St. Paul and Minneapolis. Curing Ills with Music.

It is now seriously proposed that a musical guild should be formed in London for the treatment of illness, to be called "The Mission of St. Cecilia." The first instance recorded of music having been tried as a curative agent was when David played the harp to the sick King Saul; and it is chronicled that early in the performance Saul threw his javelin at the young harpist. The guild in question is be composed of lady vocalists and violinists, a combination in the presence of which even persons in robust health have been known to tremble. One of the rules for the guidance of the proposed guild is that the music shall not be played in the sickroom but in an adjoining chamber. This would be a wise precaution. The performers could make their escape before the irate patient should have time to reach them with his bootjack.—Philadelphia Record.

Real Life in Dead Letter Parcels.

Snakes are but a few among the many dangerous things that reach the department in dead letter packages. Live centipedes and tarantulas, horned toads and Gila monsters contribute to this lost freight. Small alligators from Florida not infrequently turn up. Among other gruesome objects similarly received not long ago was a human ear inclosed in a letter, perchance by some ruffian who had made it his trophy; also the scalp of an Indian woman with long black hair, and a grinning skull which a Philadelphia physician refused to receive because letter rates were charged upon it.—Washington Letter.

Science in Bread Making

At the recent annual meeting of the American Chemical Society held in washington, D. C., the question of the value of carbonate of ammonia as a leavening agent in bread, or as used in baking powders came up for discussion, in which. Prof. Barker, of the University of Pennsylvania, and Prsident of the Society; Dr Richardson, late of the United States Depaytment of Agriculture in Washington; Dr Wm. McMurtrie, late Prof. Chemis in the University of Illinois; Dr. E. H. Bartley, late Chemist of the Brooklyn N. Y., Board of Health, and Prof of Chemistry of the Long Island College, and others took part.

The consensus of opinion was overwhelming in favor of the employment of ammonia. It was stated as a fact that ammonia rendered the gluten of the flour more soluble than the original gluten, and that the bread in which this action was produced by carbonate healthful, and because of the extreme volatility of carbonate of ammonia, and its complete ex, pulsion from the bread in the process of baking, it is one of the most useful most healthful and most valuable leavening agents known

These conclusions are borne out by the vlaborate and exhaustive experiments made by Prof J. W. Mallet, of Vniversitf of Virgini, awhich show conclusively that bread made with a baking powder in which one per cent of carbonate of ammonia is used in connection with cream of tartar and sodo, is not only of uniformly better color and texture, but a product more wholesome, becaus the ammonia serves to neutralibe any organic or lactic acids present in the flour

A Sensation in Fashionable Circles

In Saratoga. Among the arrivals at one of the hotels yesterday in Saratoga were two stylishly dressed and beautiful young girls accompanied by an elderly lady and three servants. They registered from Baltimore, and it was learned that they were reigning belles in that city. The eldest sister had just entered her twentieth year. Her friends tendered hear a delightful reception and she was the recipient of many costly gifts. Her fiance arrived upon the scene driving a pair of perfectly-matched cream-colored ponies, handling cream colored reins with gold buckles and attached to a cream colored dog-cart with gold trimmings elaborately mounted. These he presented to the lady of his choice; and at an earlo hour the following day the chief designer of the New York and Paris young Ladie's Fashion Bazar received a message from the ladies to produce within the next five days four pale-cream India silk dresses of the same tint as the gold-tipped dog-cart. The proprietor of the New York and Paris Young Ladie's Fashion Bazar will spare no pains to make these natty driving costumes the most showy and gorgeous of the season. The design which struck their fancy was that shown in figure 5 of the September number of the New York and Paris Young Ladie's Fashion Bazar. But where the dress is designed in pink their dresses are to be finished in pale eru. The frill on the sleeves of Fig. 5 will be jauntily looped up with real pearls set in gold buckles. Send to Geo Munroe, New York, for a copy of the September number, containing this magnificent design. Price 25 cents.

THE statement is made that in all their wars the British have won the splendid average of 82 per cent. of the battles.

THE growth of horse racing in the last ten years is illustrated by the fact that in 1880 the money added to prizes by the racing associations amounted to $180,000. Now it reaches $4,000,000.

SNAKES are so abundant and troublesome in the country about Talcott Mountain, Connecticut, that the farmers in the vicinity have clubbed together to hire a man to kill the reptiles. He is paid 5 cents a head, and manages to make from $3 to $5 a day.

THE Chinese are getting hold of large quantities of fruit in Tulare County, California, and are becoming quite a factor in the shipping trade. One great objection to this is that Chinese, not realizing that they are cutting their own throats thereby, persist in sending inferior fruit to market.

ACCORDING to the Vienna grain congress the wheat crop shortage of the world is about 90,000,000 bushels. Either this congress doesn't know what it is talking about or the crop of statistical liars this year exceeds by far anything ever known in the past.

A NEW Swedish glass is claimed to have important advantage for microscope and other fine lenses, giving greatly increased power. The chief improvement over other fine glass consists in the addition of phosphate and chlorine, which impart absolute transparency, great hardness and susceptibility of the finest polish.

IT is narrated that a New England preacher of the olden time was paralyzed during a sermon by discovering his rude offspring in the gallery pelting the hearers in the pews below with peanuts. But while the good man was preparing a frown of reproof the young hopeful cried out: "You tend to your preaching, daddy, I'll keep 'em awake."

FEATHER-BED soldiers will not do in China. Yih, the Tartar general of the Kehlung-kian territory, being lately ordered by imperial decree to make the annual military inspection, pleaded indisposition, and requested to be allowed to ride in a sedan chair, instead of on horseback. The Emperor replied that no military official is permitted to ride in a chair, and that the request could not be granted.

THE victory of the Congressionalists in Chili is largely accounted for by their having rapid firing guns and smokeless powder, which the Balmacedists had not. One pleasurable feature of the Mannlicher rifle, with its smokeless powder and little bullet, was that a projectile would pass through two men and kill a third wherever they happened to be massed three deep. Hotchkiss gun also did fearful work.

A YOUNG merchant of New York, who had a sweetheart in London, recently sent her a valuable ring to bind their engagement. She proved fickle and in order to break the engagement she sent back the ring. This, however, was not the end of the lover's hard lot, for when the ring was delivered to him in New York he was informed that there was $46 duty due on it. The merchant paid the money under protest and appealed to the Treasury Department for relief.

THE rate of travel of thunderstorms has been studied by Herr Schronrock from the record of 197 such storms in Russia in 1888. The velocity is found to have varied from thirteen to fifty miles an hour, with a mean of 28.6 miles an hour in the hot season and increasing to thirty-two miles an hour in the cold season. It was least in the early morning, increasing to a maximum between 9 and 10 p. m. The storms traveled most quickly from southwest, west and northwest.

IN the matter of mere distance covered the records of the world's famous travelers do not make much of a show beside those of some railroad men. An old railroad man named Layton, now a sleeping car superintendent at Indianapolis, has kept a record of his journeyings since 1863, and the total is 2,338,246 miles. Conductor S. G. Boone, late of the Reading, has covered 2,847,050 miles, and another Reading conductor has ridden something over 1,597,800 miles. Even these figures would probably be far surpassed by the records of some of the old captains of the ocean steamships.

The effort to enforce the elevator law in North Dakota resulted in the issue of two writs of alternative mandamus against the Minneapolis & Northern Elevator Company at Grand Forks to compel the storage of wheat.

Joseph Plante marketed 450 bushels of new wheat at Rolla one day recently. It graded No. 1 hard, 62 pounds to the bushel. The yield was 31 bushels to the acre. He had 15 acres of oats that went 1,130 bushels.

He died soon in great agony. His home was in Kentucky. He will be buried with military honors. He was corporal of Company B. of North Dakota cavalry.

W. H. Robinson, president of the western branch of the Robertson Lumber company, was at Grand Forks recently, negotiating for the purchase of T. B. Walker's lumber interest. The transfer of the mill plant, planing mill, lumber on hand and real estate is said to be practically settled, but the question of log supply is still pending.

Dagnal Daniels, a Cree Indian, was before the board of insanity at Rolla, adjudged insane and taken to Jamestown by Sheriff McLean. He lives on an Indian homestead near St. John, and there is a doubt of his being received at the asylum. The Indian's propensity to murder is quite marked in Daniels, who has made several attempts upon his family.

Four Dickinson citizens who had restraining orders from selling liquor served on them in July, were arrested recently on a criminal charge by the state. The defendants called for immediate examination to avoid imprisonment, which was continued, and defendants are on $300 bail. Defendants would have to come up at the next term of court for trial.

The full term of the State Agricultural College commenced at Fargo the other day. The new buildings are not yet quite finished, and for the next month the institution will continue to use its former quarters in the Congregational College. Each county in the state is entitled to send one pupil, who receives free room rent at the college for one year, and the attendance promises to be large this winter.

A largely attended meeting of citizens of Huron adopted measures to make Huron the best wheat market in this part of the state. Buyers will pay from 3 to 5 cents per bushel more than neighboring cities. They have arranged for plenty of money and ample warehouse privileges and shipping facilities.

Election in Pierre, under the new Australian voting law, for the issuing of $150,000 funding bonds, resulted in the bonds carrying by a vote of 210 for the 53 against. Little interest was taken, and less than half a vote polled. The new law worked very satisfactorily. This is the first time the new law has been tried in the state.

The Vermillion council revoked the ordinance granting a franchise for water works to S. V. Salem & Co. Salem came here from Michigan and organized a stock company with $30,000 capital. He got the contract for furnishing piping, etc., and putting in works. He left for Michigan to see to the shipping of the machinery. The ordinance was revoked because the works were not finished on time and as work had not yet begun on them.

An enthusiastic convention was held at Deadwood for the purpose of arranging the Black Hills exhibit at the World's Fair. Resolutions were adopted asking the commissioners of the different counties to call a special election on the same date as the congressional election for the purpose of seeing if a majority of the people of the state favor calling a special session of the legislature to make an appropriation. Should the vote be negative the Black Hills companies will spend $100,000 for a special exhibit of their own resources. Delegates were present from all over the hills.

Among them are Archbishops Ryan, of Philadelphia; Feenan, of Chicago, and Ireland, of St. Paul. Preparations are making for the most imposing religious display ever seen in Iowa.

Manufacturers' day at Clinton was celebrated the other day, and mills, factories and business houses closed at noon for a general holiday. The chief event was the auction sale of 400 building lots in the new Manufacturers' addition. They brought from $225 up to $425. Three huge furniture factories, which will employ 600 men, are being erected there. There were fully ten thousand people at the sale. The electric street cars are running for the first time in the history of the city.

FRENCH REPARTEE.

Some Clever Answers By Clever Frenchmen,

The late Chinese Minister in Paris is credited with a reply as skillful as it was courteous to a great lady who besieged him with questions concerning his creed. He evaded them adroitly until she demanded to know whether it was true that his religion permitted a plurality of wives.

"Of necessity, madame," he replied, "a man must have several wives in order to secure all the virtues which are nowhere combined but in you."

The lady blushed and smiled, but was silenced. Less civil was the answer of the young French minister who, while preaching in a chapel in a French hamlet, where the men sat on one side of the aisle and the women on the other, was annoyed by the sound of whispering and paused in his sermon to reprove it.

"Your reverence will observe," interposed the principal woman that it comes from the men's side."

"So much the better, madame. It will end, then, some time."

A sharp reply or a finely-turned bon mot is never forgotten in France. It is a treasure in which the people take eager delight, as do other people in their crown jewels. Someone who had a keen perception of national characteristics referred to this trait when he said: "In Spain men ask of a new-comer. 'What is his birth? In Germany, 'What has he read? In France, 'What has he said? In Holland,' How much money has he?' 'In Great Britian. 'Is he English? And in America, 'What kind of a man is he?"

"Who are these?" asked Louis Philippe, when several fat noblemen seeking places at Court kept bowing low before him.

"Only jugs, your Majesty," was the answer, "that are lowered in order to be filled."

Jested His Life Out.

The Berlin papers are amusing themselves with saddling a good story on a popular Berlin physician who died there recently. A number of his medical colleagues assembled in his bedroom to consult about his case, which was altogether hopeless, a fact of which the dying man was thoroughly aware.

Suddenly the doctors, who were gravely whispering together were startled by a boisterous peal of laughter from the patient. Being asked the cause of his hilarity, he gasped forth:—

"Funny—story—occurred—to—me; —battlefield — Waterloo — French— Grenadier — lying—bleeding—many— wounds — feeling—death — near—he— counted — wounds — proudly—said,— 'Parbleu—takes—eight—Englishmen— kill — one—Napoleon's — Grenadiers.' Well," continued the dying doctor, his voice growing still more feeble with his effort. "I have just—counted—you —and I see—takes eight of my medical friends—to—kill me."

And, still laughing, he turned on his side and passed away.

GRIM VIZAGED WAR

An Island Near the Mouth of the Dardanelles Seized by British Troops.

Men and Guns From Thirteen British Men-of-War Landed on the Island.

CONSTANTINOPLE, Sept. 15.—A detachment of blue jackets and marines from a British ironclad, accompanied by a battery of light field pieces and several Gatling guns, was landed yesterday at Sigri, on the island of Mitylene, formally occupying that place in the name of the queen of England.

There is a good harbor at Sigri, and it is supposed that the British naval officer at Mitylene intends to fortify the island and to make it a coaling station and rendezvous for the British Mediterranean fleets. Sigri is on the coast of Mitylene and is about sixty miles from the mouth of the Dardanelles.

The island of Mitylene is within twenty-five miles of the Hellespont; has an area of 276 square miles and a population of 40,000. It has good harbors and a fertile soil. The principal towns are Castro (or Mitylene) and Molive. Tenedos, on the other hand, though occupying a much more advantageous position, being to all intents and purposes at the actual entrance of the Hellespont, is only five miles in length and is of a rugged, rocky nature.

It is stated that the French and Russian ambassadors have received telegrams from their respective consuls in Mitylene announcing the occupation of Sigris and stating that guns have been landed and that the islet has been surrounded with torpedoes.

MAKES THEM UNEASY.

France Stirred Up Over the Move Made by England.

PARIS, Sept. 15.—A decided feeling of uneasiness has been caused in diplomatic and financial circles here by the receipt of an alarming dispatch announcing that Sigri, on the west coast of the island of Mitylene, an island belonging to Turkey, near the coast of Asia Minor and within easy steaming distance of the Dardanelles, has been occupied by a detachment of British troops or marines, landed there from a British ironclad.

Under ordinary circumstances little or no credence would have been placed in this alarming rumor, but coupled with the story broadly circulated Saturday that Great Britain, in view of Russia's practical coercion of Turkey in regard to the passage through the Dardanelles of vessels belonging to her volunteer fleet, intended to occupy the island of Tenedos at the entrance to the Hellespont, or Dardanelles, more serious attention is paid to this dispatch from Constantinople.

The island of Mitylene would form a most advantageous position from which Great Breat Britain could control the waters of the Hellespont. On the bourse here today there was a general weakening of prices, due to the reported action of Great Britain in landing troops at Sigri, on the island of Mitylene.

STARTLING NEWS.

Thirteen Men-of-War Land Their Men and Guns Near the Dardanelles.

LONDON, Sept. 15.—Late this evening another and still more startling dispatch comes by telegraph from Athens. It is that the Greek consuls at Mitylene and at Smyrna have wired the Greek government that thirteen British men-of-war landed their men and guns at Sigri on Friday, and that they had already strongly fortified that place.

Lord Salisbury's chief private secretary has returned unexpectedly to London and is busy at the foreign office.

The St. James Gazette this evening says that the startling news concerning the island of Mitylene obviously possesses political significance of the first importance. Continuing, the same paper adds that the island of Mitylene has a position of considerable strategic importance, although possessing little in the way of fortifications.

WITH THE SULTAN'S CONSENT.

In the absence of a foreign office confirmation of the reports, and until the details of the action of the British war ships are known, the full significance of the movement cannot be revealed. It can be stated on high authority, however, that Sir William White asked the sultan to assent to the British occupation of some point within striking distance of the straits, and offering a good harborage for the fleet. Tenedos and Besika bay, where the fleet rendezvoused from 1876 to 1878, have been surveyed recently, and were reported to the admiralty adversely.

The offer made to the sultan revived the request which the British government made in 1877, prior to the acquisition of Cyprus, to purchase an island near the Dardanelles. This project was long the subject of negotiations, and was abandoned on the signing of the Anglo-Turkish convention in June, 1878. The seizing of Sigris, therefore, cannot have occurred without the connivance of the sultan. An official announcement issued in Constantinople yesterday stated that a complete entente had been arranged between Sir William White and the sultan, but the terms of the restored harmony were not mentioned.

The intimation that the seizure of the island would be followed by its fortification is modified by a Berlin report to-night that Lord Salisbury does not contemplate a permanent occupation of the island, but designed the movement rather as a demonstration to checkmate the Franco-Russian game. The movement accentuates the diplomatic crisis.

Fighting the Pool Rooms.

NEW YORK, Sept. 15.—The battle between the Brooklyn Jockey club and the city pool rooms began in earnest to-day. The association erected high fences all around the Gravesend track, so as to shut the view which was formerly had from the tops of the surrounding houses. The pool room men, however, rose to the occasion and erected on the top of the highest of these buildings a tower from which they could look over the fences into the track. Tomorrow Mr. Dwyer will play his trump card and the pool rooms may as well give up the fight. He intends to withhold all entries from the newspapers. This will hurt the attendance somewhat, but President Dwyer's aim is to break up the pool rooms and this last step will probably prove effective.

TOOK DESPERATE MEANS.

A Cousin of the Defaulting Cashier of the Fidelity Bank of Tacoma on Trial for Complicity.

TACOMA, Wash., Sept. 15.—The case of R. B. Albertson, the Seattle attorney accused of concealing stolen property in connection with the Fidelity bank robbery, was called in court to-day. He is a cousin of Edward Albertson, the defaulter who has not yet been caught. Before the hearing commenced the original complaint against R. B. Albertson was dismissed and one of grand larcency substituted. The hearing lasted all the afternoon and will be continued to-morrow.

The first witness called was Thomas B. Wallace, president of the Fidelity company, who testified substantially as follows:

On Saturday night, Aug. 22, E. Albertson absconded with money belonging to the bank. At 6 o'clock Monday morning a messenger delivered a letter to my house. On opening it I found it to be from E. A. Albertson, enclosing an agreement in triplicate and directions for me to meet a man named Chandler on Brown's Point. I got in a buggy and drove to Old Point. There I got in a skiff and went to Brown's Point and had a boatman row me over.

Mr. Wallace produced the letter of instructions and the contract. The letter of instructions is written in ink upon a letter head of the Fidelity Trust company, and was as follows:

L. B. Wallace, Dear Sir: I am short in my account $11,750, being the aggregate of the sums squandered by me at different times since one year ago this month, in speculation. I haven't a dollar left. Realizing the impossibility of replacing it, being in constant dread of detection, I have become desperate, taken enough more to make $20,000 and left. The amount of securities taken from the safe in addition to this cash is over $900,000, which includes all the company's notes, collateral and land company's contracts. In addition to this I have changed all the combinations after locking all the bank books in the steel vault. If you will sign three papers in triplicate herewith in the presece of two witnesses, have the same duly acknowledged, deliver all three to Fred N. Chandler at Brown's Point on or before 9 o'clock Sunday morning (see directions below how to meet him) he will deliver to you all securities, etc., valued at $900,000 and the key to all the safe doors; you can commence business at the usual hour. My personal notes of $4,000 I have destroyed, but the collateral of forty shares of stock you will get if you meet Chandler with the papers duly executed. You will find the company's seal in the drawer at the end of Denman's desk. Any time between 6 and 9 o'clock on Monday morning you will get all above as stated and be ready for business with the loss of just $20,000.

Refuse to execute and deliver the papers and securities valued at over $900,000, none of which except the company's notes has the company any record of, will be burned, and it will cost you $8,000 to $10,000 to open and replace the vault and safe doors, and four to six months' time in which to do it. You yourself well know at the lowest estimate it will cost you not less than from $100,000 to $200,000 of above besides trouble to get balance and besides this loss in actual money, just imagine the loss to the company through the loss of confidence of the public and the absolute suspension of business for a month. To sum up, accept the conditions and lose $20,000, which people need not know about; reject them and lose—make your estimate out of the $900,000, and be compelled to absolutely suspend business. You can't pay any checks as you have no balance books to go by and you dare not draw on New York and San Francisco, for both accounts are wrong. I have made a memorandum and left in the safe just how the shortage lies. E. A. ALBERTSON.

Directions for meeting Chandler: Get a man to row for you (if you want him) to row you to Brown's point. Before rounding the point you will see a pole sticking in the bluff (near the top) and a white handkerchief attached to it. At this place between the hours of 6 and 9 o'clock Monday morning, Aug. 24, land your boat and leave your oarsman in it. You will at once see Chandler, who will direct you how to reach him. When there hand him three papers, and if duly signed, witnessed and acknowledged he will place in your hands the articles mentioned in the agreement, when you will at once sign receipt for them. Any attempt to intimidate or parley with Chandler will be of no avail, and will only result to your disadvantage, and if you come with more than one man or have any boat follow and precede you or should you fail to be there by 9 o'clock Chandler will be gone and all books and papers will be destroyed. Your only hope of recovering those papers, valuables, etc., will be for you to carry out these instructions to the letter. E. A.

I delivered the agreement to Fred N. Chandler, accomplice of Albertson's, on Brown's point on Sunday morning. The agreement was that the Fidelity company, in consideration of return of the securities, agreed not to prosecute Albertson. On the back was the receipt from the company. It stated that we were not to prosecute Albertson and Chandler. I signed the papers and I went to Old Town and procured a boat and rowed to Brown's Point. Chandler was standing on the embankment when I arrived. He said to land and come to the foot of the bank. The bank was perpendicular. I went up to where he was and asked him if his name was Chandler. He asked me to follow him into the woods. We went about a fourth of a mile. He did not seem to know where they were. He found two packages in different places. After searching he found them under some logs. I took both packages. They contained notes and collaterals. I satisfied myself that they were genuine and gave him the agreement. I asked if Albertson had taken his wife and children. He said "No, we had nothing to do with it. You'll probably hear from me in a few days, I'll send you some money." No money was in either package and no bank notes. They contained notes, certificates of stocks, warrants and land contracts valued at $600,000. There was also a new combination for the safe.

I returned home, took the combination and opened the vault and safe doors. There was $15,000 gone in money, currency, and $3,000 drawn out of the New York account. He had stopped the time clock by putting stocks into the cog wheels. To the best of my knowledge, the securities were taken on Saturday, Aug. 22. The bank has received all the property taken but $10,000. The defendant, R. B. Albertson, came into my office on the second Monday after this occurrence and introduced himself as a cousin of E. Albertson. He had been at the residence of E. Albertson and Cohoon and had found Mrs. Cohoon and Mrs. Albertson very sick on account of this affair. He told me that unless Cohoon was produced at once steps would be taken to produce him. He said it was necessary to save their lives that Cohoon be produced. He said he had not seen E. Albertson for a year. He then said he had seen him last spring. The letters were prepared, I think, on Aug. 22, and the bank was robbed that night. I left the bank at 3 p.m., and everything was all right. Everything was in the safe in the vault.

This closed Mr. Wallace's testimony. Several other witnesses corroborated Mr. Wallace. It is the purpose of the prosecution to show that R. B. Albertson prepared three weeks previous to the robbery agreements above, which were signed, and that he was cognizant of the whole affair. This, it is claimed, will be shown by documents and letters in the handwriting of R. B. Albertson and by one of the agreements of which possession has been obtained. It is also said that it can be proved that the two Albertsons had been in conference in Seattle and Tacoma previous to the commission of the crime.

A State Stuffed With Towns.

New York Advertiser: The president has perpetrated a really good joke. Noticing the frequency of stops along his railroad route in Vermont, at Middlebury he was moved to remark:

"Perhaps it is because your state is not very large, and you have had to put your towns close together in order to get them all in."

This quiet bit of humor covered a compliment, too, that was readily appreciated by the Vermonters.

A Word About Farming.

Farming may not be as delightful as we, in the poetic mood in which we sometimes write may paint it, but there is one fact in relation to the calling that cannot be denied and that is this, that however distaseful it may be to some, there is none other beneath the sun that men can engage in with a like capital that is anything like as pleasant and profitable. Every farmer may not see the golden beam of promise in every rick of well cured hay or every waning field of golden grain, but there is no rubbing it out that the farmers home may be made the most beautiful spot on earth and his table supplied with the best eatables the land affords and if such entertaining surroundings a good appetite such as the farmer always possesses, and a table spread with delicious fresh vegetables, fruits, ice cold cream, butter and crisp brown chicken, will not produce happiness then we are at a loss to know what will. This is according to our ideas the ne plus ultra of existence and for these things poetry or no poetry commend us to farm, the green leaf embowered home in some nook or mountain dell behind which rises romantic cliffs that run back into lofty heights of eternal snow and pinacles grand, and from whose doorway spreads out to the front waving meadows, marked with winding willow, fringed brooks clear as crystals and alive with mountain trout; or even the home on the broader valley beneath the spreading cottonwood and from which the valley and heights in all direction from an ever-changing panarama of things to please and delight the eye and refresh the mind—Rocky Mountain Husbandman.

Pampas Horsebreakers.

Amid this mass the quick eye of the domador soon singles out a horse suitable to his requirements, perhaps the finest and most vigorous of the whole tropilla. As the animal passes beneath the cross-beam—swift as a dart, unerring as the lasso—the domador drops upon his back and rides on with him into the spacious corral. The terrified brute plunges and rears and rushes madly here and there, rousing the whole herd into a state of excitement and fear.

Once free of the danger of collision with the herd, which has fled to the furthest corner of the corral, the domador whips from his arm a large and coarse cloth, with which he promptly succeeds in blinding the captured horse, and then begins in a variety of ways to master the proud wild spirit beneath him. The horse will kick out in all directions, plunge and rear, whirl round and round, backward and forward, and even roll over and over; but as well might he attempt to shake off his own name as to rid himself of that terrible incubus, the domador. The latter, of course, takes care that the animal does not roll over him. He simply steps off and aside till the brute picks himself up again, only to find that the grip on his sides is there as strong as ever. Blindfolded as he is, he cannot see his tormentor, although at times he manages to elude the latter's grasp and attempts flight; but the ready lasso speedily arrests his mad course. As a rule, before the horse has had time to regain his feet the domador has contrived to slip into his mouth the cruel massive bit used all over the Platine countries.

The effects of this new instrument of torture are fearful. Maddened by the pain, quivering with rage and fear, the animal dashes away in any direction, forced by the cruel bit now to this side now to that, until the domador at length succeeds in forcing him through the gates of the corral into the wide open camps. Then begins a mad race for liberty or the mastery of a noble spirit. At a speed to which terror, pain and fury lends wings, horse and man thunder over the ground, which seems literally to fly beneath their feet. Foam drops like flying scud on each side of the horse; his nostrils dilated and his eyeballs distended, mane and tail streaming on wind which their speed creates; the tamer seated cool and grim, hand and eye alert, and every faculty bent on overpowering the fierce beast he bestrides. Thus they pursue their wild flight for many leagues, and the domador knows that when the brute's mad rage is spent and his strength exhausted he will slacken his headlong pace more and more, until he almost completely halts, and soon, breaking out into a fit of trembling, surrender forever the savage freedom of his untamed state. The rest of his education is easy and need not be told.

Incubator Experience.

The Farm, Field and Stockman publishes the following experience of J. F. Wood with incubators.

I see very little in print, from those who are running incubators, in regard to their experience with the machine. Is it because they are not very successful, or is it because so great they are afraid of too much competition?

I want to relate some of the difficulties I find, and if anybody can give any pointers to help me any I would be glad to hear from them. I have been trying artificial incubation this summer for the first time.

From all the information I could gather on the merits of incubators the one I have is as good as any. It is easy to run, even here, where the outside temperature always cools off in the night from 20 degrees to 40 degrees. I have kept it steady at about 103 degrees to 104 degrees with very little variation. It is top heat. The water in the pans underneath evaporates readily, yet is always cool.

So far I have only been able to hatch about two-thirds of the fertile eggs; the others are dead in the shell, when almost ready to come out and a few pip and then die. Those that hatch come out lively and smart. Now is this the common experience with incubators or am I or the incubator at fault? There is something wrong somewhere, for I have set forty hens with the same kind of eggs, and when they set steady every fertile egg has hatched.

Will some one explain the difficulty? Is a machine that has both top and bottom heat any better?

Tankage.

This is the name given to a product of rendering establishments; it consists of meat, bones, hair, gristle, food, etc., from which the fat has been taken, brought to dryness and ground. It is very rich in nitrogen and phosphoric acid, and is a most admirable manure for garden and fruit crops. I have found it to give good results wherever tried in the garden, but it is especially valuable on lawns and in the green house, though for greenhouses and pot plants generally it should be used in connection with a small amount of potash salt. In the open field I have used it at the rate of 1,000 pounds per acre without any injury, and this is probably as large a quantity as could be applied at one time economically. A much smaller quantity, from 400 to 600 pounds, would be enough for an ordinary application to a lawn or field in grass. To the lawn it would be well to apply it several times in the course of the growing season, and if possible just before a rain. Also on garden crops it should be applied several times at intervals of three or four weeks during the growing season. On plants in pots I used it at the rate of one teaspoonful to a five inch pot, applied to the surface of the soil. The price at which it is sold at the present time varies from $10 to $15 per ton f. o. b. in south St. Paul. This material is at present our cheapest commercial source of phosphoric acid and nitrogen.

A Novel Corn Tie.

A writer in the Ohio Practical Farmer says: For several years we have been using the blades of the common cat tail (Typha latifolia) for tying corn-fodder. The blades should be cut before frost and in time that they may cure partly before they need to be used. If they are too dry and brittle, dampen the bundle as you would rye straw. A grass sickle is very good for cutting them. We think them better than straw, being much stronger, nicer to handle, and if cared for, will last for a number of years. If this plant is growing near you it might be well to try it. Or if it is not handy it would, I think, be profitable to start it. It will thrive in a rich black soil if there is a constant supply of water. It will produce more bands on any area and does not need to be cared for as rye.

Cleanliness for Sheep.

Be careful about the sheep pens during warm weather. It is necessary to have pens into which they may go for shelter during storms, but they should not be housed in these at night unless they are dry and well ventilated. Nothing is worse for sheep, more quickly inducing disease, than overwarm pens, which of necessity become damp and foul. Cleanliness is perhaps more essential for sheep than for any other class of live stock.

Resembles Beeswax.

A French chemist has found a mineral which after being melted and remelted several times, resembles pure beeswax so closely that even experts can only distinguish it after careful study. It is extensively used in Europe to adulterate wax, which has fallen greatly in price on account of the fraud. Its scientific name is or ceresin, purified ozokerite.

A Few Hints.

A good constitution in a hog is inherited, not made.

Sour milk is a treat both to hens and to little chickens.

If only one thing is used coal oil is probably the best for lice.

Provide a shelter under which the young fowls can run whenever it rains.

Giving the hogs the run of the timber pasture will maintain better health.

Young poultry should not be allowed to go on the roosts too early; it causes deformed breasts.

Hens should never be fed so well that when they are given a good range they will not forage a good portion of their time.

Turkeys can, to a considerable extent be given sweet skimmed milk in place of water, and if the drinking vessels are kept clean will be all the healthier.

"The advantage of hatching guineas under common hens is, that properly managed, they are usually more gentle than if the guinea hens are allowed to hatch them out and raise them.

While old hens usually lay larger eggs than pullets the shape of the egg has little or nothing to do with the life germ, and if the broad end is smooth and the egg is properly fertilized it will hatch.

A Darling Little Dunce--The Coyote and the Crows--Fight With a Big Kittie--What to Do With a Bad Temper--An Author's Pot Pourri.

A Darling Little Dunce.

She did not look at all like a dunce, as she sat on the lowest step of the new house that the workmen were finishing inside.

I wondered whose home it might be, and I fancied that the little girl might know.

"Can you tell me who is building this house?" I asked.

"Oh, my papa," she said looking up into my eyes with the bluest eyes I ever saw.

"And who is your papa?" I asked.

"Why, he's papa!" she said, with loving emphasis.

"Yes, but what is your papa's name?"

"His name is papa."

"But what do other people call him? I urged. "They say Mr.—what?"

"I—don't—know," a little cloud coming over her sunny face.

"Can't you recollect what strangers call your papa, gentlemen who ask if he is at home? Don't they ever ask you that?"

"Oh, yes; they say, 'Is your papa at home?'"

"Well, what is your name?" I asked, thinking I might find out what I wanted to know.

"Celeste," was the answer.

"Celeste what?"

"Celeste Rosabel Marguerite. That is enough, isn't it? Mamma says I have almost as many names as a princess."

Just as I was turning away, a girl of about eight years ran out from the house opposite.

"There's Bessie! P'r'aps she'll know. Bessie! Bes-sie!" called the little one at my side.

And Bessie came.

"Bessie, what's papa's other name 'sides papa?"

"Why, Mr. Griffith, of course! What a little dunce you are!"

"Am I a dunce?" and the blue eyes looked up tearfully.

"You are a darling," I whispered, taking the sweet upturned face between my hands and kissing it.

Then the blue eyes smiled again, and the dimples danced back to their places, and I continued my way down town.—Youth's Companion.

The Coyote and the Crows.

Once on a time many crows lived in the edge of some woods. A little out into the plain stood a very large tree with much sand under it. One day a coyote was passing, and heard the crows singing and dancing under this tree, and came up to watch them. They were dancing in a circle, and each crow had upon his back a large bag.

"Crow-friends, what are you doing?" asked the coyote, who was much interested.

"Oh, we are dancing with our mothers," said the crows.

"How pretty! And will you let me dance, too?" asked the coyote of the too-whit-lah-widdeh crow, [captain of the dance].

"Oh, yes," replied the crow. "Go and put your mother in a bag, and come to the dance."

The coyote went running home. There his old mother was sitting in the corner of the fireplace. The stupid coyote picked up a stick and struck her on the head, and put her in a bag, and hurried back to the dance with her.

The crows were dancing merrily, and singing:

"Ai mana, que-ee-rah."—"Alas, Mama! you are shaking, you are shaking!"—The coyote joined the dance, with the bag on his back, and sang as the crows did:

"Ai nana, que-ee-rah, que-ee-rah." [Ai nana is an exclamation always used by mourners.]

But at last the crows burst out laughing, and said, "What do you bring in your bag?"

"My mother, as you told me," replied the coyote, showing them.

Then the crows emptied their bags, which were filled with nothing but sand, and flew up into the tree, laughing.

The coyote then saw that they had played him a trick, and started home, crying "Ai nana!" When he got home he took his mother from the bag and tried to set her up in the chimney-corner, always crying, "Ai nana, why don't you sit up as before?" But she could not, for she was dead. When he found that she could not sit up any more, he vowed to follow the crows and eat them and eat them all the rest of his life; and from that day to this he has been hunting them, and they are always at war.—C. F. Lummis, in September St. Nicholas.

Fight With a "Big Kittie."

The cougar secures its prey by creeping stealthily behind it until near enough to spring upon and bear it down. It will attack a man in the daytime if it can approach him unseen and is hungry. In an article contributed to "The Big Game of North America," Mr. W. A. Perry describes a fight between a Swedish sailor and a cougar, which took place near the house of the writer's father.

The sailor, Joseph Jorgenson, ran away from a British man-of-war, anchored in a harbour of British Columbia, and made his way to Washington, where he took up a quarter section of government land. One morning he began clearing a spot whereon to build a house. He was vigorously wielding a spade when suddenly his arm was seized by a cougar's jaws.

Joe was very strong, and by a kick in the stomach he forced the beast to fall to the ground. The cougar sprang at the man's throat. With his left arm Joe warded off its jaws, while with his right he dealt it a blow in the ribs that again felled it to the ground.

Quick as a flash the beast seized Joe's left hand. With his right fist and heavy boots Joe beat and kicked the animal until it released his hand. Retreating a short distance, it sprang on his breast and knocked him against a tree. Again he cuffed and kicked it until it let go and retreated.

Joe then happened to see the spade he had been using lying at his feet. He snatched it, and warded off the cougar's spring by a timely thrust.

The brute fell at the man's feet, but instantly rose and seized him by the thigh. Concentrating his strength, Joe drove the sharp blade of the spade into the beast's head, and it fell dead at his feet.

Bitten and scratched, the blood streaming from a dozen wounds, he reeled home. It was many weeks before he recovered, and when he grew strong he had lost all desire for farming. He shipped on an American coaster as a sailor, saying that he had less fear of the sharks than of the "Big Kitties."

What to Do With a bad Temper.

Starve it. Give it nothing to feed on. When something tempts you to grow angry, do not yield to the temptation. It may for a minute or two be difficult to control yourself; but try it. Force yourself to do nothing, to say nothing, and the rising temper will be obliged to go down because it has nothing to hold it up. The person who can and does control tongue, hand, heart in the face of great provocation, is a hero. The world may not own him or her as such: but God does. The Bible says that he that ruleth his spirit is better than he that taketh a city.

What is gained by yielding to temper? For a moment there is a feeling of relief; but soon comes a sense of sorrow and shame, with a wish that the temper had been controlled. Friends are separated by a bad temper, trouble is caused by it, and pain is given to others as well as to self. That pain too often lasts for days, even years—sometimes for life. An outburst of temper is like the bursting of a steam boiler; it is impossible to tell beforehand what will be the result. The evil done may never be remedied. Starve your temper. It is not worth keeping alive. Let it die.—Exchange.

Started by Stephen Girard.

A characteristic story of Stephen Girard was that he induced a boy to work for him till he was 21 years old by promising to give him a good start in life afterward. When the time came the young man applied for the promised reward. The eccentric old merchant looked at him for a moment, and then said, gruffly.

"Go and learn a trade."

Considerably cast down—he had expected a very different start—the young man turned away, but after some reflection, knowing something of the other's peculiarities, he decided to do as he had bidden and learned the cooper's trade.

When he had mastered it, a year or so later, he presented himself again, and the old man gave him an order for two barrels. He made them and delivered them, and Mr. Girard examined and praised them.

"Now," he said, "you have a capital that you cannot lose, for you can always fall back on your trade if you meet with adversity," and then he advanced his protege a considerable capital with which to start in business.

An Author's Pot Pourri.

"Author's pot pourri" is a game which is becoming more and more popular. A large number of leaves are to be made of tissue paper of the pale-green shades or, if preferred of a perfect rainbow of colors. After being carefully shaped like a leaf, they are folded down the center and crinkled over a knitting needle; one side is then folded over, and a small card-shaped paper, with a desirable quotation written on it, is gummed to the end. Very light weight paper is the best for the latter purpose.

When the company is ready for serving, the dish holding the leaves is passed and each guest selects one, and upon reading the quotation gives the name of the author.

If he does this correctly the leaf is his. If he fails the leaf is returned, and at the next passing of the dish another is selected. Some will soon collect a large bouquet of leaves, and the one having the largest number a pretty prize is given.

Because He Was Fair.

"I like to play with Neddie Myers, mamma, because he is fair. He never tries to cheat playing marbles, like the other boys do," said Charlie Keech to his mother.

"Then I hope you imitate his good example," responded she.

"I do, mamma. I shouldn't like to not play fair, when he is so fair himself," said Charlie earnestly.

Boys may set a good example in play as well as in work. And a boy who is upright and honest in play, even if he does not come off victorious so often, will find that in the end he gains more than if he were to stoop to cheating.

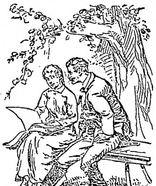
One thing, however, grated harshly upon her sense of the fitness of things—the banjo. It was unclassic. It belonged to the negro. She had never before heard of a young lady who played the banjo, or, if she had, the questionable environments of the stage were connected with the thought, but the tone of this instrument was so pure, and there was something so insinuating in its short, runic notes, that Aunt Marguerite hesitated and finally was captivated. No doubt the influence of Rosalie's personal loveliness had the greatest part to do with this conquest.

"It has something just a grain wicked in it, I fear," Aunt Marguerite would say, speaking of the banjo. "Something, I cannot tell what, of la sauvagerie du pays, as if it refused to immediately connect itself with our gentility—our culture."

To this fine old lady of the "low country," life at the mill presented a thousand savage aspects. Its limitations seemed so strange and narrow, its influences so subtle and irresistible, its social setting so crude and valueless. But despite the dull, dry and cramped situation, Aunt Marguerite discovered that a new strength and elasticity were coming into her physique, and that her mind was taking on a most unusual clearness and serenity. Was it in the water she was drinking, the food, the air, the variegated landscape views, the matchless blue sky. Was it in the bird songs that called her from sleep in the cool sweet mornings? Was it in the dreamy hum of water that lulled her to sleep at night? No matter what influence worked the change, she felt something akin to second youth stealing into her life. Ah, the childless woman had found a sweet, sincere and innocent nature upon which to exhaust her love!

CHAPTER V.

AUNT MARGUERITE PREVAILS.



"You are very beautiful, Miss Rosalie."

About two weeks after the arrival of Aunt Marguerite at the mill a thing came to pass which caused her to begin fearing lest the seed of trouble had already been sown in Rosalie's life. It was a visit from that magnetic young cavalier Frank Ellis, who, thinking he had thoroughly outwitted the government detectives, had once more begun his riding into and out of the valley on his mysterious business. He brought some papers and magazines for the members of the mill household, among them a recent number of The Revue des Deux Mondes for Colonel Chenier, who, from natural bent, distaste for everything American since the downfall of the south, and from long habit, turned toward France for all his reading. A gay fashion periodical pleased Rosalie with its colored plates representing stylish women and children at a northern summer resort. With all a young girl's curiosity touching them, she yet seemed not to think of these lovely and costly dresses, bonnets and things in connection with herself.

She mastered with quick glances the minutest details of their construction and arrangement, admired the exquisite blending of colors, the graceful lines of waist and skirt, the jaunty elegance of this hat or the quiet charm of that bonnet. Her taste was not at fault. She chose the simpler things. But she chose them in the abstract and with no personal view, not with any immediate sense of their appropriateness to a purpose or need of her own. Ellis sat on a bench beside her and helped her turn the leaves of the periodical, now and then offering some light comment on the plates.

Aunt Marguerite noticed with the practiced eye of one old in the ways of society that this young man was no boorish mountaineer. He was a keen, thoroughly sophisticated, self poised man of the world—a narrow world, maybe, but the world all the same. She did not like his restless eye, his startled glances, as of a hunted man, and she recoiled from his big pistols, his gun and his bowie knife. He looked to her like a bad man, who could nearly hide his badness under a veneering of suave politeness. His voice had false notes. And yet she could see how easily he might have been a good and perhaps even a great man. His large head, his strong, dark face, his air of imperiousness, his finely rounded jaws, were the exponents of a high order of ability.

"How well such a dress as that would become you!" he said to Rosalie, pointing [illegible] ruffled and flounced in the then prevailing style; your complexion and your pale, bright hair would blend so sweetly with that color."

This seemed to Marguerite Chenier Roosevelt a piece of cool, devilish wickedness. She saw Rosalie glance down at her own coarse white dress, dusty with flour, a shadow of self consciousness flitting across her pure face. Ellis bent closer to her ear, and added in a very sweet soft tone:

"Blue and gold; your hair would fall over that rich silk like fleeces of sunset cloud over a blue sky. How I should like to see you in that sort of attire! You are very beautiful, Miss Rosalie—Miss Chenier," his voice dropping almost to a whisper.

But Aunt Marguerite overheard every word. She could not help it.

A rich blush leaped into Rosalie's cheeks, and then a pallor followed, which affected Aunt Marguerite deeply.

Ah, this serpent in Eden! The good woman felt as if she would like to bruise his head with her heel.

"Come, Rosalie dear," she said, "I want you to go with me to my room, please. You know you haven't read to me any today."

The young girl rose promptly, with a quick responsive smile, as her aunt's voice called her wholly back to herself.

"Oh, madam," exclaimed Ellis deprecatingly, "I have but a few moments to stay, can't you let Miss Chenier show me the rest of these pictures? I'm a genuine child about looking at pictures of any sort."

Aunt Marguerite affected not to hear him.

"Come on, dear," she added; and Rosalie obeyed.

"Goodby," he said, holding out his hand, which the girl took.

"Goodby," she responded.

As their eyes met he said: "I, too, should like to hear you read. Won't you read some for me one of these days?"

"Oh, yes, sir, if you would care to listen," she replied.

"Come on, child," persisted Aunt Marguerite.

The cavalier darted a quick, intense look into the old lady's eyes, then lifting his hat and bowing very low, turned, mounted his horse and rode away up the valley.

Aunt Marguerite was wise. She did not venture a word to Rosalie about this young man just then, much as she felt like saying what she suspected. It was too often the case, she reflected, that a young girl would develop a sudden and mysterious perverseness when too directly approached in a matter of this sort. She preferred to bide her time and compass her duty in the surest way. She began gradually.

"Is this young Mr. Ellis a very nice young man?" she demanded of Rosalie, some time after he had gone. The question was put in the most careless way, and in a tone indicative of no special desire for an answer.

"Oh, yes, very nice, indeed," responded Rosalie, looking straight into Aunt Marguerite's little eyes. "He's the best young man I know. He's so brave too. He will fight any one."

Mrs. Roosevelt attacked her smelling bottle in a way so vigorous that it made Rosalie laugh. The old lady was beginning to think that these up country folk must set a high value on fighting. She had heard much said on this subject within the last few days.

"What good is there in fighting?" said she: "the war is over. It would be much better if young men would think of nobler things."

"Oh, they don't fight much," responded Rosalie, "except when Yankee detectives come in here to interfere with their business. Mr. Ellis told me he should not want to hurt any one, 'if he could have his rights without.'"

"What is his business, dear?" asked Aunt Marguerite.

"Why, I don't know," replied Rosalie: "I could ask papa. It's some sort of dangerous business though. The Yankees are trying to break him up; I know that, for he told me."

"Where does he go when he rides past here up the valley? There's no town up that way, is there?"

"His business is up there somewhere. I don't think there's any town."

"He's an ugly fellow."

"Ugly?"

"Yes, I don't like his eyes, they are so restless and soulless. I think he's bad. Rosalie."

The young girl gave her aunt a quick searching glance, then her face grew quite pale. Mrs. Roosevelt pretended not to notice this, but she was studying Rosalie's face and trying hard to divine her thoughts. No doubt selfishness had much to do with Aunt Marguerite's deep interest in this matter. She had once for all set her heart upon taking Rosalie to Savannah. Already the minutest details of her plans were perfected, though she had never more than hinted them to the household at the mill. Lately she had been telling Rosalie a great deal about her mansion and its surroundings, its books, its furniture, its garden and its tropical plants and trees. She had described the fine shell roads, her carriage and horses, the beautiful suburban places, Bonaventure, Thunderbolt, Tybee and the many grand old homes in the country. Then, too, she had spoken freely of the young gentlemen and young ladies who often came to her house; of how the gentlemen talked and of what the girls wore; of how these gay young people [illegible] the house ring with mirth; how the grand piano would fill the spacious rooms with music. Rosalie would listen with lips apart and eyes darkened with intense interest.

When Aunt Marguerite began to suspect that her niece might be growing too tender toward the mysterious young cavalier, she at once conceived the plan of hurrying her away out of reach of this threatened calamity. She had frequently asked her how she would like to go live in the Roosevelt mansion, and mingle with the happy young folk of that grand, shady old city, and Rosalie had said she would be delighted; but there was Colonel Chenier, would he let his child go? The question had to be answered. Why not now? As for Rosalie, if her heart had not been too deeply touched, she would be easily managed.

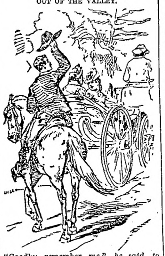
And so Aunt Marguerite at last fell to work in earnest, laying siege to the Chenier household, and attacking from every side at once. She was irresistible. She carried the place by storm, and had her way.

Mrs. Chenier consented when Aunt Marguerite whispered in her ear the doubt she entertained respecting Frank Ellis' intentions. Colonel Chenier finally gave in to the educational argument. Rosalie ought to have liberal advantages. It was a shame for her to be wasting her precious beauty and youth and rare mental gifts here in this dreary, dreamy little valley. As for Adelaide, she soon came over to Aunt Marguerite's assistance, and the fight was won.

Then the preparations began, and they were not allowed to flag until the carriage stood in front of the old mill to take away its light and life.

CHAPTER VI.

OUT OF THE VALLEY.



"Goodby—remember me," he said to Rosalie.

Rosalie looked back as the gay new carriage from the railroad town rolled away from the old mill. Bright tears were in her eyes and a worried look in her face. The parting had been a hard one. [illegible] into the mill to cry alone. Colonel Chenier and Adelaide stood near the broken stone wall striving to look cheerful. There was the mossy big wheel, dripping and cool. The mulberry tree was dusky with its mature June foliage. A genuine southern drowsiness was in the air. On the line of mountains in the west some slanting cloud lines rested, half concealed in a fine gray blue haze. As the mill receded with the going of the carriage Rosalie felt as if the world itself were quietly withdrawing. She felt also a dizziness, as if she were soaring away into distance. Her father and sister seemed to waver and fade out from her vision. The little valley drew its lines together, shriveled and dry.

After a few crooked miles along the stream their road suddenly turned boldly into the foothills, and soon began zigzagging its way up the mountain toward which they had been going.

At a stony bluff where a spring gushed out, the driver stopped to water his horses in an old mossy bucket, or rather a one-handled piggin. All around the wood was dense and silent. It was a lonely spot where one might imagine robbers lying in wait. But the gray lizards were the only lurking things discovered? A crested vireo now and then sent its shrill note through the silence.

"I shall be glad when we are once in the car and well started," said Aunt Marguerite, looking doubtfully about and sighing as one who is bored.

Rosalie did not respond. She watched the horses drink, with long hissing sips, the pure cold water, her eyes full of quivering tears.

A sharp clacking on the stony road above them announced the coming of one who soon appeared around the first short turn. It was young Ellis on his superb gray steed. He rode directly to the carriage, where he drew rein, and, lifting his broad hat, bowed to his saddle pommel.

"Good morning," he said, then glanced inquiringly from Aunt Marguerite to Rosalie and back again, an unpleasant look of suspicion beginning to cloud his face. "You look like travelers. I hope you don't mean to desert the mill, Miss Chenier?"

"I am going home with Aunt Marguerite," she replied, her voice shaking a little.

Ellis compressed his lips and stroked his horse's mane. There was a knot of wrinkles between his eyebrows.

"You don't mean to stay long, I hope?" he rejoined; fixing his eyes searchingly upon her and measuring her graceful figure, so perfectly shown by the gray traveling dress.

The driver had remounted to his seat, but sat respectfully waiting for the conversation to end.

"I don't know how long I may stay," she half sobbed; "aunt wants me to stay always."

"Always!" he echoed.

"She is to be my daughter from this time on," said Marguerite Chenier Roosevelt, coldly and decidedly, as if to end the matter at once. "Drive on," she added to the colored boy.

Ellis lifted his hat again, but there was a terrible look in his eyes as they scowled at the old lady.

The carriage proceeded.

"Goodby—remember me," he said to Rosalie. His voice reached her ear softly, sweetly, and his words caught in her memory and lingered like some bit of a sweet, sad tune.

"Goodby—remember me," she quavered back to him, and then a great humming filled her ears and her heart seemed to stand still.

When they drove into the village where Mr. Roosevelt was to meet them with his private car, it was far on toward noon. The streets were almost deserted, and the new white buildings, erected amid the debris of the old town Sherman had destroyed, glared fiercely in the sunlight.

Mr. Roosevelt's car had just arrived, and Mr. Roosevelt himself promptly came to greet them—a tall, gray man with the hawklike face of a Jew, and the bearing of an old time southern gentleman. He took Rosalie's hand and held it caressingly as he offered some warm, informal salutary phrases, his voice winningly cordial in its gravity and depth. He hurried them into the car, one of those sumptuous structures which our railroad magnates affect, where he held a quiet interview aside with Mrs. Roosevelt.

"To Chicago!" exclaimed Aunt Marguerite in response to his first sentence.

"Yes," he added, "yes, to meet a representative of the Dutch bondholders and my coadjutors in Chicago. It will be a pleasant trip for you and Miss Chenier."

Aunt Marguerite lifted her vinaigrette and reflected. Here was a swift turn in her affairs.

"How long shall you be there?" she presently inquired.

"I cannot say, possibly a month, or even two months," replied Mr. Roosevelt, "but in any event it will be pleasant. You have never seen the great west. Chicago is a wonderful city, and the way from here to there lies through a charming country—the great prairies and all that."

"Oh, there's no argument," replied Aunt Marguerite, half ruefully, "if you must go we must go too, and there's the end of it."

It thrilled Rosalie when the train began to move. It was her first experience in railroad travel. Through the window she saw the houses of the little town slipping away to the rear. A current of cool air came in and momentarily strengthened.

Mr. Roosevelt sat down by her and gradually drew her into conversation as they went clattering along between the sweet dusky summer hills.

An exhilaration took possession of her. All traces of her recent tears disappeared. Her cheeks glowed and her eyes took on their wonted depth and clearness with an added intensity which was not lost on this strong, healthy old man.

"That's a charming girl, Marguerite," he said to his wife, when the opportunity offered; "it does one good to be near her. She's like some rare blossom or—or—or something. See what a profile and what hair, and then that half wild grace and that incomparable air of innocence!"

"How you rave!" exclaimed Aunt Marguerite; but she was greatly pleased that her husband should like Rosalie.

The young girl was a few feet away, still utterly absorbed in watching the changing landscape as it fled past.

It was long after nightfall when they reached Chicago. Mr. Roosevelt had telegraphed for rooms at one of the great hotels, whither they were driven through the broad streets, amid bewildering lights and in a hoarse conflict of sounds. The air from the lake had a most decided chill in it. It was as if they had suddenly reached the true north. Overhead, the thin, high clouds seemed to scud across the great black blue abysms of sky into which no starlight could penetrate. Rosalie had grown used to sudden changes, and this last only served to impress her with the vast distance which now lay between her and the drowsy little mountain valley, where, in the dear old mill, father, mother and sister were at this moment talking of her. She could hardly wait until she got into a room with Aunt Marguerite to cover her face and cry.

Next morning she and Mr. Roosevelt took breakfast together in the great crowded dining room, but they had a small table quite to themselves. Rosalie found it very amusing to watch all those people from behind the morning newspaper that Mr. Roosevelt had given her. Only a few women could be seen, and most them were ready with hats and wraps to continue their journeys, being mere transient stoppers. The men were, as a rule, well dressed, well fed looking persons, apparently in a great hurry, and each on good terms with his neighbor. They all ate rapidly, some of them dividing their attention between their beefsteak and their newspapers, taking a mouthful and a paragraph alternately.

Rosalie quickly noticed that Mr. Roosevelt was the object of much attention from many persons in the room, and in glancing through the newspaper she found the following:

"Mr. Auguste Roosevelt, the great southern railroad king, is in the city, stopping at the Grand Pacific. He has with him his wife and daughter."

She smiled delightedly, thinking how this would please Aunt Marguerite, who had not come down, but had ordered her coffee served in her room. She did not for a moment suspect that she herself was an object of much more attraction for the masculine eyes in that room than Mr. Roosevelt, though it was plain enough to every one else that she was. Her freshness and beauty of face, her unconsciousness of self, the lithe grace of her figure, which Colonel Chenier used to say was svelte despite its plumpness, her rare gray eyes and pale gold hair, the perfect poise of her rather large head, all were emphasized in their effect by the combination of gray and blue in her elegant morning [illegible]

ECHOES OF THE RAPIDS

F. J. Detling of Sheboygan, Wisconsin, a former resident of this place, is in town.

Xavier Lambert sends us the following item: Thrashing has begun for good. S. Champagne has thrashed 2884 bushels of wheat from 95 acres. The quality is good.

Mr. Weidenhimer.- Goot morning; how var is it to St. Poul?" Hayseed—It's a good ways. Who do you want to see there?" Mr. Weidenhimer—"Mineself.

Reports of wheat yields in many cases give surprising results, and it is safe to say that the average will be 30 per cent. higher than at first estimated.

Nick Nimesgern will now concentrate his energy in his North Side store, having disposed of his branch store. Nick is stocking up hugely preparing for the fall trade.

Archie Brunelle of Louisville thrashed 1,000 bushels of wheat from 40 acres, the wheat all panning out No. 1 hard. The crops in Louisville this year, a resident informs us, are far in excess of all expectations, and the farmers' spirits are assuming their old time buoyancy.

Felix Rauenbuehler of Crookston will assist Adam Schmitz in the harness shop. Mr. Rauenbuehler is a practical harness maker.

See Adam Schmitz' ad in another column. Adam has a full assortment of horse millinery at low prices.

Mrs. Wm. J. Dargau, Mrs. L. A. Kaufer, Mrs. W. A. Schreiter and Miss Lizzie A. Boyle drove to Crookston Sunday, returning Tuesday.

Mr. and Mrs. J. D. Marshall will occupy their residence on Oct. 1st.

Mr. and Mrs. W. A. Schreiter will move into their residence on Kretzschmar ave about the 1st of October.

Joe Paradis has returned from his outing.

Blinkers—"Halloo, Winkers. I hear you married a woman with an independent fortune." Winkers (sadly): "N-o, I married a fortune with an independent woman."

The mails have been three and four hours late in the morning several times the past week. It was in most cases owing to delay on the main line. Our bobtail is O. K.

"Then when you have finished your lecture,' said the professor of elocution and deportment to young Dulle, "bow gracefully and leave the platform on tiptoes." "Why on tiptoes?" queried Dulle. "So as not to wake the audience."

Rev. Arpin conducted services at St. Mary's Sunday.

Inquiries for realestate are constantly increasing. Arrivals at the hotels are numerous.

Tellesfore Brunelle will entertain the patrons at Mead & Co.'s refreshment parlors.

W. T. Spillane's new residence on 3d st is enclosed and being plastered. It will be ready for occupancy in a short time.

C. W. Mead & Co. will have a finely furnished bar room.

Mat Skala's place on Broadway is the popular refreshment parlor. To spend a pleasant evening, call around there. The purest liquors and the finest brands of cigars on the market. Billiards in connection.

Recently a tramp stole a horse from a farmer's pasture, in Sanborn, South Dakota, and the farmer's daughter mounted another horse and pursued the thief nearly fifty miles, secured the horse and returned the same day.

The enormous crops alone would be sufficient to make business lively in town this season: add to it the acquisition of our new railroad and things are bound to hum.

Work on the North Side dam continues and the dam will soon be done. It will be a fine structure and one of the institutions of which Red Lake Falls may boast.

Mrs. Isaiah Gervais has thrashed 4,000 bushels of wheat from her farm. The many friends of this estimable lady are much gratified at this result.

The prospective location of the Great Northern depot near Main and 1st st south has been announced by officials. It had been generally thought this would be the location. The G. N. will thus be in a position to get the greater portion of the traffic unless the N. P. sees fit to move their depot to a more central location.

Mrs. Squiggs: "Henry, that scarecrow down in that field is so monotonous that it worries me, standing so still." Mr. Squiggs: "Scarecow! Maria, that's the hired man."

All kinds of COAL for sale at Hoskin's elevator.

Ray Meehan drove to Thief River Falls Monday returning Tuesday

Chas. Langevin Sr. reports a good business in his new location, South Superior.

Moses Guerard was down from Poplar River Saturday laying in a supply of groceries. Moses states that he tried the smudge as a preventive of frost and found it very effective. That portion of his wheat effected by the smudge is a grade higher than that not effected.

Now we are enjoying our ideal September weather. The many-tinted autumn leaves are the only reminder that the summer is dead.

A. D. Wishard shipped a car of wheat to Duluth Monday.

The N. P. is doing itself proud in furnishing cars this year and if the supply continues there will be no cause for complaint.

Chas. Langevin Sr. has been in town this week. Mr. Langevin is one of the appraisers of the Langevin estate here and the work of appraising this valuable property as ordered by the probate court of Hennepin Co. will soon proceed. A clear title can now be had to any of this property through this court and shortly the whole matter will be so adjusted that no more difficulty will be experienced in transactions relative to it.

Last winter a German lady of this city who had carefully memorized the words "hearth" and "transom" got them mixed in her mind, and astounded her friends by telling them it was so cold that she had "sat all day with her feet over the transom."

Mrs. Huss of Wild Rice, Minn., is a guest of Mrs. B. Zaiser.

Tellesfore St. John has removed the kitchen from his residence—making room for the railroad.

Mr. E. Robillard's little four-year-old son was poisoned by eating rind of a plant which looked like a vegetable and died last Thursday after violent convulshions, and was buried on Friday. Mr. Robillard lives in the Thirteen Towns and is a cousin of Mr. T. Robillard of this place.

Arthur Zaiser returned from the southern part of the state Saturday, where he has been the past six months.

Mr. Laframboise was up from Gentilly Saturday in company with Mr. Cadieux. He is quite lame yet from the effects of his sprain a couple of months ago.

Landlady (delightedly to new boarder): "I must congratulate you, Mr. Byseps, on your ability as a carver. You dismembered that chicken beautifully." Mr. B.: "Thanks. I deserve no special credit. I'm a stone cutter."

Thrashing is in full blast, and the yield per acre is generally up in the 20's and often reaches and surpasses the 30 mark.

Sunday night quite a storm arose, and several outhouses were blown over.

Crookston Times: The Chicago Tribune spells it "thrashing," just as it is pronounced.

The Crookston Times spells it "threshing." Where ignorance is bliss, etc.

A girl baby was born to Mr. and Mrs. Paul Holtzknecht a week ago Friday. We didn't intend to let the baby get old enough to talk before mentioning it, but had not heard of it before.

Cashier Garceau returned from St. Paul Monday morning.

Ed Moran's trotting stallion is improving greatly under his training. Those horses of Ed's are attracting much attention among horsemen.

Mrs. Wory (to the nurse): "Rose, you must really take better care of the children. Here you have gone and let poor Arthur bite his tongue again!"

Hector, the year old son of Mr. and Mrs. George Brunelle, had a painful swelling on his side, which was lanced yesterday. The swelling was large and caused the little fellow much suffering. He is improving rapidly since the operation.

Aspirant: What is the chief requisite for a young lady entering the literary field?" Editor: "Postage stamps."

Ovide Emard has opened a confectionery store in the building adjacent to McClatchie & Co.'s hardware store, having bought the stock of Nick Nimesgern. Ovide will conduct a popular store, and here's success to the new institution.

Helmuth Zaiser returned Saturday a. m. having enjoyed a week's visit in the twin cities.

We acknowledge a pleasant call from the Village Blacksmith, John Leveck. John usually makes the round once a day. Everybody knows John and John knows everybody. He is one of the best blacksmiths in the world, and has been located in Red Lake Falls from its earliest infancy, and has always taken a prominent part in local matters. He is a well informed man, especially in local affairs. He can locate a depot with wonderful accuracy before the profile has been submitted. He is a dude in no sense of the word.

Account of Minneapolis exposition N. P. R. R. will sell tickets at one and one third fare round trip. Sell on Aug. 25 28 and Sept. 1, 4, 15, 18, 22, 25, plus 25c admission coupon. Sell on Sept. 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, at one fare to St. Paul and return plus 25c [illegible]

Mr. and Mrs. F. L. Neville arrived on this morning's train. Mr. Neville is agent for an encyclopedia.

Ray Meehan contemplates leaving for his home in Milwaukee shorly. Ray's friend's here will be sorry to see him leave.

The artesian well seems to be taking a "much deserved rest."

Mrs. W. J. Flack's sister, Mrs. H. McManus, of Luce Minn. arrived Monday on a visit.

Dr. I. Turcot writes from Minto that he is kept very busy attending to professional call. He will be at Red Lake Falls some time in November.

Farmer Joseph Smith is thrashing He thraseed 1,100 bushels of oats yesterday.

Louis Huot, Louisville, reports a yield of 1,500 bushels of wheat from 50 acres. Mr. H. expected about 1,000 bushel and is surprised at the yield. He is a firm believer in good seed hereafter as last spring he obtained two bushels of seed wheat from the state experimental station which yielded sixty bushels of a superior grade to the other, which was from local seed. The yield was 40 bushels per acre he having but an acre and a half of this.

While away ye editor had the pleasure of attending the fair held by the Indian ladies of White Earth, for the sale of their bead and fancy work. The tables were well supplied with tastily desined useful and orenemtal articles. A dinner which was a model of taste and excellence was served by the ladies at noon and the day was tapered off with a social dance in the evening. A large number of visitors from Detroit and other cities were present and made extensive purchases and the only thing wanting was the classic form of poor Lo in his blanket to add an air of genuineness to the scene.—McIntosh Time.

Jeweler Flack has just received another invoice of new goods.

Three rooms in the schools were closed several days this week, owing to a misunderstanding between three of the teachers and the board of examiners. They were reopened today by request of the board of education.

Una and Ina McClachie gave a birthday party yesterday, which was attended by a host of their little friends. It was their eighth birthday anniversary. The little girls are twins, universal favorites, the pride of their fond parents, and as much alike as two peas. The party was a huge success, and their friends are hoping that Una's and Ina's birthday will come frequently.

TOSSINGS.

Not a wink all night. Toss? I should say so!
Turned fifty times, more or less: counted sheep—
A great flock disappearing, leap by leap,
Over a fence into dreamland, watched the flow
Of dim waters; thought myself in a show
Riding the merry-go-round with a sweep,
And several that made me dizzy; still no sleep.

Then I fell to thinking whether or no
There were crumbs in the bed, laughed, blamed the seams
In the sheets; got up, turned them, unfast
The blinds; again lay down longing for dreams
And sweet slumber that came not, till at last
Just as across the hills the daylight crept
And the redbreasts sang of morning, I slept.

MABEL'S CARE.

When the train moved away from the station, Mabel pulled out her little red-bordered handkerchief and cried. There, in the car window, was Fay, her dearest friend, moving farther away from her each minute. For awhile she could see Fay's hand and handkerchief moving from the window, but they had passed out of sight Mabel sobbed aloud. Right by her side stood Fay's mamma. She, too, stood watching the signal till it was lost in the distance. Then she turned and held out her hand to Mabel.

"Come, Mabel," she said in a voice that trembled somewhat, "let us go home now."

"As they walked away together, sympathetic eyes of the bystanders followed them. One soft-hearted baggageman shook his head sadly.

"Hard, isn't it?"

The man standing next him nodded.

"And it seems only the other day they were married!" he answered. "How proud and happy they were! What was the trouble, do you know?"

"No said the other, with a wrinkle of the eyebrows. "Some nonsense, I guess. Ralph always was a quick-tempered fellow, and she was an only child, you know. I never thought they'd separate, though—and such a sweet little girl!"

His companion smiled a little.

"Did you notice the other one?" he asked. "That's Colburn's young one. Fay and she are as thick as peas. It'll be very lonesome for Mabel, now."

Mabel was already lonesome as she walked away from the station with Fay's mamma. When she looked up, however, and saw the tears in Mrs. Fenwick's eyes she winked very hard to keep back her own tears. She did not know that the reason Fay had been sent away was that Mr. and Mrs. Fenwick had separated now, but she felt very sorry for the parents left behind, and had promised Fay to take good care of them.

"I do not think my mamma is happy," Fay had confided to her, "for she cries a great deal. I am very sorry to go away just now, only Aunt Lottie wants me so much. And papa is not very well, I think. Sometimes he is cross, and things are all different from what they used to be. You must be good to them, Mabel, so they will not be too lonesome for me;" and Mabel had promised that she would. Now she took Mrs. Fenwick's hand as she trudged along by her side.

"I will be your little girl till Fay comes back," she said. The sad face smiled a little as Mrs. Fenwick looked down at the child thoughtfully.

"Thank you, dear," she said.

Mabel's active little brain had already devised a plan.

"Every morning on my way to school I will stop and see you," she said, after a minute, "and—let me see—every afternoon when I don't have many lessons, and when my teacher does not keep me after school, I will stop in the store to see papa."

"Papa!" cried Mrs. Fenwick.

She had hardly listened to the child, but started then, for Mabel's papa, poor young Jack Colburn, had died years ago.

Mabel laughed merrily.

"If I am your little girl," she said quickly, "then Fay's papa is mine."

Mrs. Fenwick flushed a little.

Mabel talked on without stopping.

"Sometimes we went into his store coming home from school," she continued, "and I know just where to find him—down in the little office at the end, sitting on a high stool, and the man outside always smiles at us just as pleasant, and says:

" 'Step right in, little ladies.' "

Mrs. Fenwick choked a little. How many times had she been in that little office, but now she would not go any more.

That evening she was all alone. No tired husband came home to tea, and Fay was far away with Aunt Lottie. Some of the neighbors thought of the lonesome little mother, but none ventured to intrude upon her in her sorrow.

In the morning Mabel came in as Mrs. Fenwick was eating her breakfast. This was an every-day occurrence when Fay was at home, for the two children walked to school together.

"Good-morning," said Mabel, smiling.

"Good-morning," said Mrs. Fenwick. "Come here and kiss me."

The little girl did so and rubbed her own chubby cheek against Mrs. Fenwick's.

"I wish I could stay with you," she said sadly, "but I daren't be late at school. It's very lonesome without Fay, isn't it?"

"Yes," answered Fay's mother, her eyes filling with tears.

Mabel walked around the room in silence.

"On my way back from school," she said, finally, "I'll go in and see Fay's papa."

"You are very thoughtful," observed Mrs. Fenwick.

Mabel laughed.

"I am taking care of you two till Fay comes back," she answered.

Then she picked up her lesson-books and kissed Mrs. Fenwick good-by.

"Take good care of yourself till I come back," she said.

Mrs. Fenwick stood at the window watching the little figure go down the street. She would turn around every minute and throw a kiss at the window, as Fay used to do.

School was very lonesome for Mabel. Usually Fay sat by her side, and at noon they ate their lunch together under one of the big trees in the school-yard. Some of the other children came up to Mabel now, but she turned away from them all with a little sigh. Had she not promised Fay that she would be true to her and take no other place? At noon she put her little lunch basket on the desk before her and ate alone.

The afternoon seemed very long, but when school was dismissed at last Mabel was the first to leave the building. Up the street she ran, around the corner by the green lamp-post, and never stopped till she had reached the hardware-store, where Mr. Fenwick had his little office at the end. As she pulled back the heavy door and stepped inside one of the hardware men who had a black streak across his forehead smiled at her from over the counter and asked;

"What do you want little girl?"

Mabel smiled too, as she walked past him.

"I'm going to see Mr. Fenwick," she answered.

The man who had only recently come into the store tried to stop her. She only laughed in answer.

"Oh, he will see me," she said, and pushed open the office door.

Mr. Fenwick turned around at the sound. There he sat on the same high stool with his books open before him, but there were great rings under his brown eyes, and Mabel thought he looked tired. As his eyes fell upon the intruder Fenwick started.

"Hello, Mabel," he said.

She walked up beside his high chair and looked up at him smiling.

"How do you do?" she asked cheerfully.

"How are you getting along?"

Mr. Fenwick smiled."

"Who sent you here?" he asked.

Mabel drew her little form up proudly.

"Nobody sent me. I thought you might be lonesome without Fay."

"So I am," cried Fenwick, getting down from his stool and lifting the little girl in his arms. "So you came to keep me from being lonesome," did you?"

"Yes," said Mabel, moving her soft hand over his dark hair. "I am to be your little girl while Fay is away. Do you think that she will be gone long?"

Fenwick hesitated. He did not care to tell Mabel that Fay would not come back till it had been leagally decided which parent should have charge of her.

"It's very pleasant where she is," he said finally. "I shouldn't wonder if she didn't come back right away."

Mabel brushed away a tear.

"It's very hard on me," she said. "but I suppose it's hard, too, on you and—" She was going to say "on mamma," but thinking he might not understand, finished, "and on your wife."

"Yes, it is."

"We'll have to all keep each other from being lonesome," Mabel said, as Fenwick at last placed her on one of the stools by his side.

For some time the clerks in the hardware store cast frequent glances through the glass door at their employer in his office and the little girl at his side.

"It's Colburn's girl," said one of them; "she used to come in here with Fay Fenwick. I guess it makes Fenwick feel bad."

When Mabel came out of the office they all smiled at her. She spoke to Mr. Fenwick as she closed the glass door.

"I will try and come to-morrow," she said; "take good care of yourself."

"All right," answered Fenwick, smiling; "thank you."

He sat for some time after she left him with his head on his arm, so only the dark locks were seen through the door. The men outside felt very sorry for him.

"Its too bad," they said; "and they were so happy together."

When Mabel reached home she told her mamma what she had done. Mrs. Colburn kissed her and said:

"All right, darling."

She thought it could do no harm, and possibly the child might comfort them a little.

So every morning Mabel called on the forlorn little mother, who grew thinner and paler each day; every afternoon a second stool was placed beside Mr. Fenwick for his little visitor. The hardware men looked forward to her calls with pleasure. One gave her a pencil once, with a big rubber on the end which left a black mark after it every time she used it. But Mabel always smiled on the poor fellow because he did not know about the rubber, probably.

One afternoon she came into the store in a hurry, and ran into Mr. Fenwick's office all out of breath.

"What is the matter?" he asked.

She held up a little three-cornered envelope. It was tinted pink, and on the back was a picture of a tiny white dove with a letter tied around his neck.

"See!" cried Mabel, "here is my letter from Fay."

Fenwick took it eagerly. It was Aunt Lottie's handwriting on the outside, but when he took out the small, pink sheet his heart throbbed, for he knew his little girl had penned it.

"Read it," said Mabel.

It was written well for a girl of 10, and had cost Fay much time and trouble. It read:

DEAR MABEL: It is a very nice place here. Aunt Lottie is very good. The conductor was also very good. I hope you don't eat dinner with Annie Dobson. How are my dear papa and mamma? I want to see them and you very much. I think I will come home before long. Write soon to your affectionate

FAY FENWICK.

Fenwick put the paper back in the envelope and kissed it.

"When you answer this," he said to Mabel, "tell Fay that papa kissed her letter."

Mabel laughed.

"Somebody told you," she said; Fay's mamma kissed it too."

Fenwick colored.

"Did she see it, too?"

"Why, yes, when I went to school this morning, you know.

"Does she know you come here?"

Mabel laughed again.

"Why, yes," she said.

"Is she very lonesome?"

"You both ask me the same questions. When I go to my new mamma she says: "Do you think Fay's papa is very lonesome?' "

"Is that so?"

Mabel nodded.

"I am going to see her now," she said, after a minute.

"Who?" asked Fenwick.

"Who have we been talking about?' said Mabel, smiling; "my new mamma. She had a headache this morning, and I thought I'd better go twice to-day."

"That's right," said the new mamma's husband. "Was she very ill?"

"I think so."

Ralph Fenwick ran his fingers through his dark locks.

"Suppose you send her something by me?" said Mabel.

"What!" cried Fenwick.

Mabel nodded.

"Don't you remember when Fay and I took the tin candlestick, and how pleased she was?"

Fenwick walked around the office.

"I remember," said he.

"You might send me a pair of scissors, only that isn't a good sign—something awful might happen."

"Oh, well then, I wont send them," said he, with a faint smile.

"I suppose flowers are what the sick should always have, but you don't have flowers in your store," said Mabel.

"You wait here and I'll be back in a minute," said he.

He took his hat from behind the door and went out of the store. Presently he returned with a little bunch of violets in his hand.

"Here are your flowers," said he, holding them out to her. "Give them to her if you want to."

Mabel reached for them with a little scream of delight.

"Violets!" she said. "And I know a nice little verse to say when I gave them to her. Wouldn't that be nice?"

"Very nice," said Fenwick.

Mabel ran away joyfully. She could hardly wait now. Every little while she lifted the flowers and smelled them.

"They are different from our little vi'lets," she thought— "bigger, with more leaves, and they smell more."

She saw Mrs. Fenwick in the window as she neared the house, and ran in without knocking.

"See what I've brought!" she cried, holding out the bouquet.

She raised them to her nostrils. English violets and tender associations for her.

"They are yours," said Mabel, putting her hands behind her. Fay's papa sent them, and he said he thought it would be very nice to say this verse with them:

"The rose is red,
The violet blue,
Do you love me
As I love you?"

Mrs. Fenwick did not move her head. The color slowly mounted to her forehead. Then she raised the flowers to her lips and kissed them.

"I thought you'd like 'em," said Mabel. Then noticing that the tears were running down Mrs. Fenwick's cheeks, she ran and threw her arms around her. "Don't cry; don't, please don't," she said, entreatingly.

Mrs. Fenwick drew the little face down to her's and kissed it.

"Did he really send them?" she asked.

"Of course," said Mabel.

Mrs. Fenwick was silent a minute. Then she detached one of the violets from the others.

"Mabel, are you very tired?" she asked.

Mabel looked out of the window.

"Not so very," she answered.

"And will you do something for me?"

"Of course I will," said the child, smiling.

"Then take this to your new papa and tell him I sent it."

"Only one?"

"One is enough," said Mrs. Fenwick, smiling through her tears.

Her mind went back to the time when she first sent Ralph a violet, a token of her love for him. After the child had gone she went to the door and watched her down the street. Her heart throbbed loudly, but she still kept the fragrant violets clasped in her hands.

Mr. Fenwick had not been himself since Mabel had departed. The books lay open before him, but he paid no attention to them. He had hardly stirred when Mabel returned. She was very tired, but held out the flower to him with a smile.

"I wish it was more than one," she said, a tirfle ashamed of the gift she was bringing, "but she said one would be enough."

Mr. Fenwick's heart gave a bound.

"Who did?" he cried, and almost choked in asking the question.

"My new mamma," answered Mabel, frightened at his emotion. "She liked the flowers very much, and kissed them, and told me to bring this back to you."

"God bless the child," cried Ralph, catching up his hat and taking the little one in his arms.

Up the street they went, faster and faster. Mabel did not dare ask to be left at her own house.

Mrs. Fenwick saw them coming. She started toward the door, but it had already been opened. Mabel walked in, and Ralph and his wife stood motionless in each other's arms. Mabel walked about the room feeling a trifle ill at ease. Finally she returned to speak to them, smiling bravely, though there were tears in her eyes.

"I wish," she said, that it was time for Fay to come back. I don't think I can take care of you two much longer."

A STRANGE SCENE.

Where Tender Words and Tearful Pleadings Fall Money Succeeds.

It was in the corridor of the sixth floor of the city hall. Time, a little before 10 o'clock one morning. Spectators, a group of reporters. Speakers, a middle-aged, neatly, but poorly dressed female accompanied by a younger woman, evidently her daughter. She had inquired several times when Magistrate Pole would arrive. They impatiently paced the corridor in front of the hearing room. Before his honor arrived a man, whose appearance showed plainly that he was partial to the amber-colored beverage, joined the couple.

"Don't do it, Mary; don't do it; please don't do it," entreatingly said he.

"I am tired of your abuse, and I am going to have you arrested," remarked the elderly woman.

"Just give me another trial," he begded, "and I'll never strike you again."

"You have said that before, but you did not live up to your promise."

"Try me, oh, try me!" he persisted, "I mean it this time, indeed I do."

By this time there was quite a crowd around the speakers—though they were not near enough to interrupt the dialogue.

"You will find me a different man after this," he pleaded; "there, that will prove it"—and he kissed her.

The kiss did not molify her. She appeared to be deaf to his pleading. Probably she did not see the tear that was in his eye. But he kissed her again.

"Yes, I mean it, Mary," he said, repressing a sob. "Then look here," drawing a wallet from his pocket, causing the silver it contained to jingle; "If you come home with me now, Mary, you can have it all."

The woman took a good look at it and then said:

"Yes, it will be chicken to-day, but air to-morrow. But hand it over, Jacob. I'll give you one more trial.

They then passed down the corridor to the elevator, he with his arm around her waist, both apparently on the best of terms with each other. The young woman followed.—Philadelphia Times.

THIEVING IN OLD MEXICO.

The Peons Will Steal a Towel, But a $1,000 Package Is Safe.

In addition to the Monte de Piedad you find private pawnships all over Mexico. At these the loans are much more costly, and 5 and 10 per cent a month is not uncommon. They take any kind of property as security, and they are in reality often "fences," or recievers of stolen goods. In no country in the world will you find more petty thieving than in Mexico, and these pawnshops are largely the cause of it.

The Mexican peon is naturally a sneak-thief. He is not a robber, and while he would have no compunctions about stealing a towel or a handkerchief or a suit of clothes, he would not touch a package of $1,000 if he saw it lying in your room at the hotel. The penalties for stealing are exceedingly heavy in Mexico, and the majority of thefts are of things that would not pay the expense of conviction.

The Mexicans are expert pickpockets, and I have met a half dozen Americans who have lost their watches in Mexican crowds. A favorite place for stealing is in the churches, and at one of the big feasts which occur so often in different parts of the country one needs to watch very carefully after his pocketbook and his watch.

In sleeping on the ground floor it is always necessary to guard the windows or you may find your bed clothing or your pantaloons gone in the morning. In stops at the stations for dinner the windows of the railroad cars are always put down and the doors locked, and in carrying a small valise it is best to keep it under your feet.

Wearing Wigs an Offense.

Ladies who have been accustomed to heighten their charms by the wiles of the toilet table had better keep away from the Transvaal. They would not be long in Pretoria before they got into serious trouble. The Second Chamber of the Volksraad has passed and sent up to the First Chamber a masks and disguises bill, which will press severly upon ladies (and gentlemen, to who are not physically what they seem. Whoever wears a wig for instance, and is caught in the dreadful act, may be fined £10 or sent to prison for a fortnight.

An exception will perhaps be made in favor of actors and actresses while they are on the stage. Presumably it will be also an offense to wear a mask or go out on stilts; but those are amusements in which people do not want to indulge every day. With all the details of this highly moral bill we are not familar; but if it prohibits wigs it must surely condemn that artistic heightening of the complexion to which so many ladies are, perhaps erroneously supposed to owe something. The Puritan fathers of the Transvaal may as well do the thing thoroughly while they are about it. From the Newark Journal.

Height of English Girls.

Everyone is noticing how tall English girls are now. The fact was discussed at a dinner table the other evening, and someone said that men seemed to be growing shorter in the ratio as the girls taller. And what was the solution offered for this puzzle? it was nothing more nor less than that men smoke far too much and begin the practice much too young. it stops their growth and injures their health; while their sisters, tobaccoless, grow tall, graceful, and show the soft roses and lilies of abundant health in their faces.

DOUBLE DREAMING.

A Lady and Her Absent Friend See the Same Vision.

A young married lady relates the following remarkable experience of telepathy. Shortly after her marriage she had accompanied her husband to India. It was toward the end of the mutiny, and she was separated from him—he being about forty miles away and as she believed in great personal danger. For the first time in her young life she was left alone.

One night, on retiring to rest, feeling far from well; depressed, too, by the sense of loneliness and by anxiety on her husband's account, she "could not help crying," and fell, as she thought, into a troubled sleep, in which she dreamed or fancied that an elderly gentleman who had shown them much kindness on their first arrival in India, but who was then residing at a considerable distance, entered her room and approaching the bed said:

"My dear child, I know well what you are suffering, and, believe me, I feel deeply for you," and that he stooped down and kissed her. Though quite aware, she said, that it was merely a vision, she felt greatly consoled.

The mutiny ended she was with her husband in Calcutta at an evening party, at which she met their friend. He expressed his pleasure at seeing her again after a long interval. "It is not so long," she replied, "since I saw you," and she described the vision. With expressions of the utmost astonishment he declared that he himself had had a similar vision or rather dream. "I dreamed that I saw you crying and tried to console and kissed you."—New York Journal.

American Donkey.

An American traveller in Egypt has a paragraph about the donkey boys of Cairo, and their readiness in playing upon the patriotic feelings of possible customers.

One fellow stepped up to me, pulled his forelock,—at the same moment giveng the boy behind him an accidental punch in the stomach,—and with a grin of humor on his dirty face, said:

"Take ride, sah? Mine splendid donkey. Name Prince—" then as he caught an English word, he added, "of Wales. Prince of Wales, sah."

If I had uttered a French word the name would have been "Prince Napoleon,"

Others of the boys called out, "Mine Billy Button," "Tom Jones," "Waterloo," "Duke Wellington."

One little urchin, a better guesser than the rest, cried: "Mine berry good donkey Yankee Doodle—General Grant."

That shot took effect, and I followed the boy to take the "donk" with so illustrious a name.

Bananas as "Food."

It is not without good reason that the banana has become so popular in recent years. For it is said to possess in itself all the essentials to the sustenance of life for both man and beast. It belongs to the lily family, and is a developed tropical lily, from which by ages of cultivation the seeds have been eliminated, and the fruit for which it was cultivated greatly expanded. In relation to the bearing qualities of this fruit, Humboldt who early saw the wonders of the plant, said that the ground that would grow ninety nine pounds of potatoes would grow thirty-three pounds of wheat, but that the same ground would grow 4,000 pounds of bananas, consequently the ratio of the banana crop to that of wheat is 133 to one, and to that of potatoes, forty-four to one. —New York Tribune.

Sunlight.

Houses in places otherwise unexceptionable are so closely overhung with trees as to be in a state of humidity, owing to the prevention of a free circulation of air and a free admission of the sun's rays. Trees growing against the walls of houses and shrubs in confined places near dwellings, are injurious also as favoring humidity. At the proper distance, on the other hand, trees are favorable to health. On this principle it may be understood how the inhabitants of one house suffer from various ills as the consequence of living in a confined, humid atmosphere while their nearest neighbors, whose houses are otherwise situated, enjoy good health; and even how one side of a large building fully exposed to the sun and a free circulation of air may be healthy, while the other side, overlooking shaded courts or gardens, is unhealthy —Hall's Journal of Health.

Were a young man to write down a list of his duties, health should be among the first items in the catalogue.

A wise man ought to hope for the best, be prepared for the worst, and bear with equanimity whatever may happen.

Out of suffering comes the serious mind; out of salvation the grateful heart; out of endurance, fortitude; out of deliverance faith.

Beware of parting. The true sadness is not in the pain of parting; it is in the when and how you are to meet again with the face about to vanish from your view.

SHE.

An innocent girl was jailed in New York for a few hours recently. She worried so over it that she incurred brain fever and died.

On the fly-leaf of Book B. of the marriage records, beginning with the year 1795, deposited in the county clerks office al Mount Holly, N. J., appears this entry in the flourishing hand of W. McIlvaine, jr., evidently the clerk at that time: "Dedicated to the charmer, Venus, and to the more than captivating Hymen."

Mrs. Jennie Robinson, a wealthy Milwaukee widow, is one of the most unique prosecutors who have ever appeared in a court of justice. Having been robbed by two married women whose husbands were temporarily out of town, she prosecuted them, and when fines amounting to $95, which the criminals were unable to pay, were imposed, she put her hand into her pocket and paid the fines herself.

Two widows of revolutionary soldiers are living in Pennsylvania and drawing pensions for service rendered in the field by their husbands. One, who was the third wife of a soldier of seventy-five summers and bore him three children is now ninety-seven years old, hops up and down stairs with the liveliness of a cricket and declares her willingness to marry again, pension or no pension, if the right sort of man presents himself.

A veritable curiosity has been captured in Africa. It is an elephant larger than the late lamented Jumbo, pea-green in color, trunkless, and has tusks that branch out something like the horns of a deer. It is in possession of a native king, who will not part with it.

READY TO SHOUT "STOP THIEF."

A Smart Auctioneer Discovers That the Man on the Block May Blunder.

An auction sale was in lively progress in an uptown Broadway store the other day. The goods were a miscellaneous lot of household stuff, and were being knocked down at a lively rate. It was necessary to clear the whole lot out at any cost, and so a valuable article was generally sandwiched in between two undesirable ones, and the lot bid for in the lump.

The incongruous combinations that the auctioneer made, such as a picture, a smoothing-iron and water-jug, or a hat-rack with a tooth-brush and a blanket, caused considerable merriment among a crowd not very hard to please, and the many facetious remarks of the glib salesman, though stale enough from long usage, were accepted as pure wit and answered accordingly.

When the sale was over, the auctioneer, who had fairly been carried away by the fluency of his own tongue and the success of the affair, stepped down from the rostrum and prepared to put on his hat and coat. The crowd had lingered to pick out the goods each had bought and see to the transfer, when suddenly the auctioneer exclaimed: "I've been robbed! Who took my hat, coat and cane? Officer," he shouted to the policeman who had stood at the door to preserve order, "don't let any man out till I reach you!" Then he pushed his way to the door and scruntized eagerly each man as he came out. Presently he made a grab at one young fellow, who was gayly balancing the auctioneer's silver-handled cane in his hand.

"I've caught you, my fly rogue!" he yelled; "give me that cane and come along with this officer," and he made a grab for the stick.

The youth, pretty bold for a detected thief, aimed a blow at the auctioneer and savagely proclaimed his honesty and his intention to have revenge. The policeman collared him, however, and straightway the auctioneer spied a man walking off with his coat. Another arrest and another indignant protest. A victim with the hat quickly followed, and the onlookers began to get warmly interested.

"You put that hat up for auction yourself," yelled the last man, "and I bought it along with a lamp and a mucilage pot!"

"I bid on this coat and had it handed to me," shouted the older, "with a scrubbing-brush and bedstead."

"You knocked this cane down to me for $2, along with a broken cradle and a bonnet," yelled the third, "and I'll knock you down with it, you——," and he made a dash for the puzzled auctioneer.

Bystanders interfered here, and the absent-minded salesman was with some difficulty convinced that he had really put up and knocked down his own clothing in the excitement of the sale.—N. Y. Tribune.

A GRAPHIC TALE.

It May Have Been a Thrilling Story, But It Was Interrupted.

Mrs. Bilkins had left the table and the two men had settled back for a smoke. It was the first visit that Browne had paid the Bilkinses in several years, and of course there was plenty to talk about. Bilkins had a story to tell his bachelor friend, and after he had gotten well under way it ran something like this:

"As I was saying—You don't mind having the children in here, do you? No of course not. I knew you wouldn't. Well, we figured it out that we were 20 miles from the nearest habitation, and it was snowing like—Excuse me! Put your nut pick a little farther on the table. Mabel will get it and hurt herself with it.

"The snow, you see, was blinding, the horses were nearly worn out, and the mercury was rapidly falling. To add to the horror of the situation—look out! Albert is reaching for your plate. That's right. Put it in the middle of the table. Have you ever been lost in a snow storm? No? Well, we were. There was no question about that. And I want to tell you that it's a mighty serious thing.

"We knew that we were off the trail, but we were in hopes of finding it. If we didn't strike it within half an hour we knew—Robert, if you take any more nuts off your father's plate you'll get a thrashing. There was small chance of striking the trail, too. In fact, we might have crossed it once or twice and never known it on account of—Albert has your fruit knife. It's dangerous to leave them near the edge of the table.

"Well, we struggled on for 10 or 15 minutes more, and then we just about gave out. The snow and the cold made it unbearable. Then one of the horses gave out, and—there! Mabel has grabbed your cigar. I knew she would. Don't cry, Mabel. Run to mamma and she'll fix the burn."

Then, after Mable had left and quiet was again restored, Bilkins suggested: "You don't seem to be interested."

"Oh, yes, I am," was the reply.

"In what?"

"Is marriage a failure? Sometimes I think it is."—Chicago Tribune.

Boy Robbers in France.

There has just been discovered near Nogent-sur-Marne a band of boy robbers who plunder untenanted villas and hide their booty in a cave, like Ali Baba's Forty Thieves. The chief of the burglarious confederation is a youth of 14, named Vincent Legrand. He was captured in a field, and gave information about his companions, who were arrested by the gendarmes as they were preparing to enter their cave. Two of the precocious rascals were only 11. They lately had entered a villa and had abstracted therefrom a heap of provisions and a large quantity of wine and liquors.—London Telegraph.

FRENCH REPARTEE.

Some Clever Answers By Clever Frenchmen.

The late Chinese Minister in Paris is credited with a reply as skillful as it was courteous to a great lady who besieged him with questions concerning his creed. He evaded them adroitly until she demanded to know whether it was true that his religion permitted a plurality of wives.

"Of necessity, madame," he replied, "a man must have several wives in order to secure all the virtues which are nowhere combined but in you."

The lady blushed and smiled, but was silenced. Less civil was the answer of the young French minister who, while preaching in a chapel in a French hamlet, where the men sat on one side of the aisle and the women on the other, was annoyed by the sound of whispering and paused in his sermon to reprove it.

"Your reverence will observe," interposed the principal woman that it comes from the men's side."

"So much the better, madame. It will end, then, some time."

A sharp reply or a finely-turned bon mot is never forgotten in France. It is a treasure in which the people take eager delight, as do other people in their crown jewels. Someone who had a keen perception of national characteristics referred to this trait when he said: "In Spain men ask of a new-comer. 'What is his birth? In Germany, 'What has he read? In France, 'What has he said? In Holland,' How much money has he?' 'In Great Britian, 'Is he English? And in America, 'What kind of a man is he?"

"Who are these?" asked Louis Philippe, when several fat noblemen seeking places at Court kept bowing low before him.

"Only jugs, your Majesty," was the answer, "that are lowered in order to be filled."

The Record

Of cures accomplished by Hood's Sarsaparilla has never been surpassed in the history of medicine. And the constant stream of letters from people who were almost in despair but were cured by is very gratifying. Because of these we urge all who suffer from Scrofula, Salt Rheum or any other disease caused by impure blood or low state of the system, to try Hood's Sarsaparilla.

SALT RHEUM.

"I was troubled with salt rheum until last spring. My right leg, from the ankle to the knee, was swollen and scabbed and very painful. I used many medicines, but did not find any relief. Seeing advertised for the salt rheum, I began taking it. The first bottle did me so much good, I got two more bottles, and it has cured me. I feel all right now." T. E. STREETER, JR., Allegan, Michigan

Hood's Sarsaparilla

How About Your Mother?

Scrofula or Kings Evil is the most stubborn of all Skin affections. Whether inherited or otherwise, it is a blood disease and cannot be permanently cured by anything but S. S. S.

A GRATEFUL DAUGHTER.

My mother was sorely afflicted with Scrofula for three years and a half; during that time the glands on her neck burst open in five places. Three of the openings were small and healed right up, but the other two would fill up and break open anew, about every two weeks, always causing severe pain and often prostration. She was so reduced in strength, that tonics and cocoa wines had to be generously used to keep her alive. She commenced taking S. S. S., and improved from the start; the first bottle gave her an appetite and by the time she finished the fourth bottle her neck healed up. She is now entirely well. MRS. E. J. ROWELL, Medford, Mass.

One Pure Baking Powder.

Like Telling a Secret.

A story is told and it is a true story that over seventy per cent. of all the baking powders sold contain either alum or ammonia, and many of these powders contain both. The ill effects upon the system of food raised by alum or ammonia powders are the more dangerous because of their insidious character. It would be less dangerous for the people were it fatal at once, for then such food would be avoided, but their baneful action because imperceptible at first and slow in its advances, is no less certain.

Dr. Price's Cream Baking Powder is declared by all authorities as free from alum, ammonia or any other adulterant. Its purity has never been questioned, and while it does finer and better work, it costs no more at retail than many of the adulterated powders.

YOU WANT

a San Francisco paper and of course you want a good one. The WEEKLY EXAMINER fills the want completely, for it is the best. It gives you every week not only all the news, but the best literary and miscellaneous matter published on the American continent—that is its specialty; being the best. It wants your subscription—yours particularly—and offers not only to you, but to every other subscriber, one or more attractive premiums.

In the first place, it gives every subscriber, one of the four magnificent etchings or paintings described below, and delivers it safely at his address, postage paid.

"The Retreat from Moscow," by Meissonier,
"The Roman Chariot Race," by A. Wagner.

Each of these pictures is 21x28 inches, and they are elegantly reproduced in fac simile, showing every tint and color of the great originals, either one of which could not be purchased for $100,000.

"Women and Children First," by C. Napier Hemy,
"Christ Leaving the Prætorium," by Gustave Doré.

Each of these pictures is reproduced in photogravure, size 21x28, and eminently fitted for framing, and will adorn the walls of the most refined house.

Each subscriber has the choice of any one of these four pictures, which will be mailed him in a tube direct from the EXAMINER office, as soon as the subscription is received.

In the second place, it will give 5,000 premiums, valued in the aggregate at about $125,000 to its subscribers this year. If there are 50,000 subscribers, one in ten will get one of these premiums; if there are 100,000, only one in twenty. But no matter how many there are, each and every one of these premiums—which range in value from 50 cents to $6,000—will be given absolutely without cost to some of those who have paid $1.50 for the WEEKLY EXAMINER for one year. The EXAMINER is thoroughly responsible, as you know, or as Wells, Fargo & Co. or any bank or commercial agency in San Francisco will assure you, and the leading men of the city will see that its premiums are distributed exactly as agreed and that every subscriber no matter where he is located, will receive just what is assigned to him.

Of course you want your home paper also, and you can just as well as not save a little money by taking the EXAMINER with it. The price of the WEEKLY EXAMINER is $1.50 per year, including the premium picture and your share of the $125,000 list of premiums, which are fully described in the twelve page Premium Supplement, which will be sent free on application to What is Good Baking Powder?

It is a well known fact that carbonate of ammonia is used by bakers in the preparation of the finest and most wholesome bread and cake, and has been from time immemorial. It is among the oldest and at the same time most healthful constituentsof baking powers. It is all evolved in gas by the heat of the oven, and leaves no trace of itself in the food and this that gives it its great value as a leavening agent in the opinions of the physicans.—New York Journal.

TheBestPoultry Paper in the West

That is what Messrs. Wright & Parker, of Independence, Iowa, call their Iowa Poultry Journal, and judging from the excellent number received at this office, the claim is well founded. Their crops of contributors embraces the best talent the country affords, such as J. Henry Lee Indianapolis, artist and engraver; I. K. Felch Tenn. B. A. Fox, Island, Va.; M. K. Boyer, Hammonton, N. J.; Mrs. May Talor, Hale, Mo.; and "Trixie".——all well known "chicken cranks." Dr. G. W. Strong, Buffalo, N. Y., is the pigeon editor; C. W. Bvttles columbus, O., and Jno. Haman, Topeka, Kas., will assist him. A kennel depatment begins with the Octobernumber under monagement of a practical dog fancier. Mr. Boyer conducts the Broiler and Market Poultry department; "Trixie" looks after the Queries and Answers, and Mrs Toylor edits the Ladies department. The publishers are practical poultrymen, Mr. Paker being recognized as one of the foremost western fanciers. The Journal is the largest paper of its class publish west of the Mississippi river. Baking Powder.

WHAT THE MINNESOTA STATE AUTHORITIES KNOW ABOUT THEM.

St. Paul Minn. Pioneer-Press: If there is any doubt in anybody's mind as to the quality of the various baking powders of the market, it will be settled by the evidence given upon the subject by the State official of Minnesota. The Dairy and Food Commission and the State Chemist are the highest official authorities upon such subject in this State and their evidence will be accepted as disinterested and unprejudiced. It is their business to examine the quality of the different food products, and to suppress the sale of those found impure and unwholesome, and all will admit that they have performed their duties without fear or favor.

At a recent examination by a Legislative Committee to determine the qualities of the varous baking powders sold in Minnesota State Chemist and analysist to the Food and Dairy Commissioner, Dr. Benjamin F. Drew, gave the following evidence.

Ques.—Dr. Drew, I see by the report of the Dairy and Food Commission of this State that in making analysis of the baking powders of this country you report as a result of your work that the Royal Baking Powder contains and gives off in baking a greater per cent. of carbonic acid gas (leavening gas) than any other baking powder made; is that true?

Ans.—Yes, sir, that is a fact.

Ques.—Doctor, you also found from experiments that the Royal baking Powber will keep longer and retain its qualities better than any other power made, did you not?

Ans.—Yes, sir, I think it does.

Ques.—Now, the two most desirable qualities in baking powders are the amount of carbonic acid gas it contains and gives off and the length of time it will keep, are they not.

Ans.—Yes, sir.

Ques.—Then the Royal Baking powder, possessing these qualities, is the best powder made, is it not.

Ans.—Well, that would be the natural conclusion.

Ques.—Well, that is the fact, is it not.

Ans.—Yes, I think it is. I consider it one of the best baking powders made.

Merit Wins.

"A VOLUNTARY DEATH."

I KNEW Louis Miraz very well, in the old student days when we used to take our meals together.

Louis had the deep eyes, the pale complexion, and the long and disheveled hair of all those young men who came to town from the country to conquer glory.

He was a writer. I soon found his name in Sunday journals and reviews, and then he began to write those short and exquisite sketches which have made his reputation. Thus five years passed, when I met him one day in the editor's office of a journal for which I worked.

Each of us was as much pleased as the other at thus meeting again; and after the first "What, is it you? Is that you?" we stood facing each other, shaking hands, and exposing, in a laugh of cordial delight our teeth, which in old times we used to exercise on the same crust of poverty. He had not changed. He had not even sacrificed his long hair, which he threw back with the graceful movement of a horse who tosses his mane. Only he had the clear complexion and calm eye of a contented man, and his slim figure was clad in most fashionable costume.

"We won't drift apart again, will we?" said he affectionately, taking me by the arm; and he led me out in the boulevard, where the April sun gilded the young leaves of the plane trees.

Ah, happy day! How we exhausted the "Don't you remembers?" "Do you remember the fried eggs which tasted of straw, and the dreadful rice-milk, the melancholy air of your landlady and the German who used to pawn his watch every three months?"

Those days of hardship for Louis were finished. He had from afar applauded my success, as I had watched his. But one thing I did not know and that was that he had married a woman whom he adored, and that he had a charming little girl.

"Come and see them; you shall dine with me."

I let myself be persuaded, and he carried me to a pretty surburb, where he lived in a cottage among the trees. There everything made you welcome. No sooner had we opened the door of the garden than a young dog frisked about our feet.

"Down, Dick! He will soil your clothes."

But at the sound of the bell Mrs. Miraz appeared at the steps with her little daughter in her arms. An imposing and beautiful blonde, her well-moulded figure wrapped in a blue gown.

"Put on a plate more. I've an old comrade with me."

And the happy father, keeping his hat on his head and carrying his little girl, showed me all over his establishment—the dining-room, brightened by light bits of faience; the study, abounding in books, with its window opening out on the green turf, so that a puff of wind had strewn with rose-leaves the printer's proofs which are scattered on the table.

"This is only a beginning, you know. It wasn't so long ago that we were working for three sous a line."

And while I luxuriated under a blossoming Judas-tree which I saw in the garden, Miraz, at ease in his home, had slipped into his working vest, put on his slippers, and, lying on his sofa, caught little Helen in his arms to toss her in the air—"Houp la! Houp la!"

I do not remember ever to have had a more perfect impression of contentment. We dined pleasantly—two good courses, that was all; a dinner without pretense, where we served ourselves with the pepper-mill.

The charming wife presided with her bright smile, having her child by her side in a high chair. She spoke but little, but her sweet and intelligent attention followed our light and paradoxical chat, the good-humored fooling of men of letters; and at the dessert she took a rose from a boquet which ornamented the table, and placed it in her hair near her ear with a supreme grace. She was indeed that lovely and silent friend whom a dreamer requires.

We took our coffee in the study—they intended to furnish the salon very soon with the price of a story to be published by Levy—then, as the evening was cool, a fire of sticks and twigs was built, and while we smoked, Miraz and I, recalling old memories, the mistress of the house, holding on her knees little Helen, now ready for bed, made her repeat "Our Father" and "Hail Mary," which the little one lisped, rubbing her little feet together before the warm flame.

* * * * * * * * *

We saw each other again, often at first, then less frequently, the difficult and complicated life of literary labor taking us each his own way. So the years passed. We met, shook hands. "Everything going well?" "Splendidly." And that was all. Then later, I found the name of Louis Miraz, but rarely in the journals and periodicals. "Happy man; he is resting," I said to myself, remembering that he was spoken of as having made a small fortune. Finally, last Autumn, I learned that he was seriously ill.

I hurried to see him. He still lived at the pretty suburb; but on this sombre day of the last of November the little house seemed cold, and looked naked among the leafless trees. It seemed to me shrunken and diminished, like everything that we have not seen for a long time.

The dog was probably dead, for his bark no longer answered the sound of the bell when I passed the little gate and entered the garden, all strewn with dead leaves where the night's frost had withered the last chrysanthemums.

It was not his wife—she was absent—it was Helen, who received me—Helen, who had grown to be a great girl of 14, with an awkward manner. She opened for me the door of her father's study, and brusquely lifting her great black eyelashes, turned on me a timid and distressed glance.

I found Miraz huddled in an easy chair in the corner of the fireplace, wrapped in a sort of bed-gown, with gray locks streaking his long hair; and by the cold, clammy hand which he reached towards me, by the pallid face which he turned upon me, I knew that he was lost. Horrible! I found in my unhappy comrade that worn and ruined look which used to strike us formerly among the poor Poles we used to see.

"Ah, well, old man, things are not going well?"

"Deucedly bad, my boy," he answered, with a heart-breaking smile. "I'm going out stupidly with consumption, as they do in the fifth act, you know, when the venerable doctor, with a head like Beranger, feels the first walking gentleman's pulse, and lifts his eyes toward heaven, saying, 'The death struggle approaches!' Only the difference is that with me it continues; It will not conclude, the death-struggle. Smoke away; that doesn't disturb me," he added, seeing me put my cigar one side, his cough sounding like a death-rattle.

I tried to find encouraging words. I talked with him, holding him by the hand and patting him affectionately on the shoulder, but my voice had in my own ears the empty hollowness of deceit, and Miraz, looking at me, seemed to pity my efforts.

I was silent.

"Look," said he, pointing to his table; "see my work-bench. For six months I have not been able to write."

I made a new effort to revive him. Die! at his age. Nonsense! He wasn't taking care of himself. He must pass the winter in the South, drink a good draught of sunlight. He could. He was easy in his money matters.

But he stopped me, putting his hand on my arm.

"Listen," he said, gravely, "we have seen each other seldom, but you are my oldest, perhaps my best, friend. You have proved me pen in hand. Well, I am going to tell you something in confidence, for you to keep to yourself, unless it may serve on some occasion to discourage the young literary aspirants who bring manuscripts to you—always a praiseworthy action.

"Yes, I have been successful. Yes, I have been paid a franc a line. Yes, I have made money, and there in that drawer are a certain number of yellow, green, and orange papers, from which a coupon is clipped every six months, and which represent $800 of income. It is rare in our profession, and to gain that poor hoard I have been obliged to imitate the unsociable virtues of a miser, know how to deny a a jewel to my wife, a dress to my daughter. "But at last I have that money. And I often said to myself, if I should die their bread is assured, and here is a little marriage portion for Helen! And I was content—I was proud!—for I know them, the stories of our widows and our orphans, the 4-penny help of the Government, the tobacco shops for 600 francs in the province, and, if the daughter is intelligent and pretty like mine, the dramatic author, an old friend of the father, who advises her to enter the Conservatory of Acting, and who makes of her—mercy of God! that shall never be.

But for all that, my boy, it is necessary that I should not linger. Sickness is expensive, and already it has been necessary to sell one or two bonds from that drawer. To seek the sunlight, as you suggest, to bask like a lizard in the tropics, one more bond must go, and there would not be enough to last to the end, if I should wait for seven or eight years more, now that I can no longer write. Happily, there is nothing to fear. But what I have suffered since I have been incapable of writing, and have felt my hoard of gold shrink and diminish in my hand like the Magic Skin of Balzac is frightful. Now you understand me, do you not? and you will no longer bid me take care of myself. No; if you still pray to God ask him to send me speedily to the undertaker's."

Fifteen days later some thirty of us followed the hearse which carried Louis Miraz to the cemetery. It had snowed the day before, and Dr. Arnold, the old frequenter of painters' studios, the friend and physician of the dead man, walking behind me, called, in his brusque voice:—

"Very commonplace, but always terrible the contrast: a burial in the snow—black on white. The Funeral of the Poor. Brr!"

At last we came to the edge of the grave. The place and the time were sad. Under a cloudy sky the little yew trees, swayed by the wind, threw down their burdens of melted snow. The bystanders had formed a circle, and were watching the grave-diggers, who were lowering the coffin by cords.

Near a cross bearer, whose short surplice permitted the bottom of his trousers to be seen, the priest waited with a finger in his book; and, having grasped the rim of his hat under his left arm, the orator already held in his black-gloved hand the funeral oration, hastily patched up by the aid of a comrade, over a couple of glasses at the corner of a cafe table.

Suddenly, as the priest began his Latin prayers, Dr. Arnold seized me by the arm and whispered in my ear:—

"You know that he killed himself?"

I looked at him with astonishment. But he pointed to the group in black, composed of the pretty widow and her daughter, who were sobbing under their long veils and clasping each other in a tragic embrace, and he added:—

"For them. Yes, for six months he threw all his medicines in the fire, and designedly committed all sorts of imprudence. He confessed it to me before his death. I had not understood it at all—I, who had expected to prolong his life at least three years by creosote. At last the other night, when it was freezing cold, he left his window open, and if by forgetfulness, and was taken with bleeding at the lungs. Yes, that he might leave bread for those two women. The cure does not dream that he is blessing a suicide.

But what of it, my good fellow? Miraz is in the paradise of the brave.

THREW HIS MONEY AWAY.

Story of a Young Physician Who Was a Victim of Circumstances.

When the doctors, in a jovial mood, get together they invariably tell stories if they have any time on their hands. Half a dozen Rochester physicians were feeling particularly happy and exultant a few days ago. They had passed a delightful hour in making an examination of the body of a man killed in an accident, and were well pleased with each other and the gentleman who had furnished them with their scientific amusement. When they were through their work they adjourned to the office of one of their number and began telling experiences and reminiscenses. They told of exciting amputations and exhilarating operations until it came the turn of the oldest man present to speak. Then such a tale was unfolded as brought tears to the eyes of many present.

"When I was a young man," said the old physician, "I practiced in a Western city. This was about 30 years ago. It was not a great while after I had my first case that I was called one day to attend a young man who had a most peculiarly-shaped head. Uuder my care the fellow soon got well, but I cultivated his acquintance to serve certain ends that I had in veiw.

"When I came to know the young man pretty well I told him frankly that I wanted his head. You all know that I have always made brain diseases a specialty, and I thought that the man's head, with its abnormal development, would be a splendid subject for study. The chap fell in with my proposal. I gave him $300, and he made a will in which he mentioned me as the heir to his head. To be sure the fellow was young, but so was I, and I was willing to wait.

"Well, gentlemen, within less then a year after we had completed arrangements the young fellow was killed."

"Lucky man," said one of the listeners, and all the others gave evidence that they thought the doctor was fortunate.

"But, gentlemen," continued the old physician, "the fellow was struck on the head by a safe that fell to the sidewalk while being taken in the third story window of a block," and the old fellow's voice choked with emotion at the remembrance of the wrong that had been done him.

"Saddest thing I ever heard of" said one of the listeners, while others walked up and shook the victims' hand, too full for utterance.—Rochchester Democrat.

Might Have Been Worse.

The Princess Charlotte, daughter of George IV., was a young woman of great spirit and originality. One day she took a fancy to make her will, and in it bequeathed all her property to one of her teachers. He was imprudent enough to keep the document, and was in consequence, dismissed as soon as it was discovered.

The gentleman who then undertook his duties did so with great zeal, and had reason to find one, at least, of his corrections productive of good.

He chanced to enter the room when the princess was reviling one of her attendant ladies, in great wrath, and after giving her a lecture on hasty speech, he presented her with a book on the subject.

A few days later he found her still more furious, and using language even more violent.

"I am sorry to find your Royal Highness in such a passion," said he. "Your Royal Highess has not read the book I gave you."

"I did, my lord!" cried she, tempestuously. "I both read it and profited by it. Otherwise I should have scratched her eyes out!"

An Enthusiastic Muscovite.

The first Russian visitor on board the French men-of-war at Cronstadt effected his appearance among them in a somewhat peculiar manner. He was a Russian soldier, who had an extended swim in the Baltic off Cronstadt to where the French squadron was approaching. When he reached the first vessel, which was just about to anchor, he clung to the side, shouting with all his might the only French word he knew, "Vive la France!" Great were the rejoicings when the unclad enthusiast was hauled on board. He was treated to any number of cognacs, wrapped in a French naval cloak, and preparations were made to convey him back to quarters in the ship, when suddenly he threw of his cloak, plunged into the sea, and still shouting, "Vive la France!" returned home as he had come.—St. Louis Republic.

The Man-Faced Crab.

One of the most singular-looking creatures that ever walked the earth or "swam the waters under the earth" is the world-famous man-faced crab of Japan, Its body is hardly an inch in length, yet the head is fitted with a face which is the perfect counterpart of that of a Chinese coolie; a veritable missing link, with eyes, nose, and mouth all clearly defined. This curious and uncanny creature, besides the great likeness it bears to a human being in the matter of facial features, is provided with two legs, which seem to grow from the top of its head and hang down over the sides of its face. Besides these legs, two "feelers," each an inch in length, grow from the "chin" of the animal, looking for all the world like a colonel's forked beard. These man-faced crabs fairly swarm in the inland seas of Japan.

IT WAS A NARROW ESCAPE.

He Thought There Must Be Something Wrong With His Eyes.

He came storming into the office of the Thunder Bay Sawlog, stuck an ax in the door-jamb and hung his coat on it, says the Free Press.

"Can I see the editor?" he asked, in a voice with a volume of sound to it as loud as an agricultural report for the fiscal year ending July 1, 1891.

"Really, my dear sir," replied a nice little man writing at a puncheon table, "I cannot say definitely whether you can or not, but, judging from the question you have just asked, I should say you could not see him."

"Why can't I?" insisted the visitor.

"Again, my dear sir, I am at a loss to reply. It may be as a result of myopia, or astigmatism, or ophthalmy, or glaucoma, or conjunctivitis, or heuritis, or cataract, or one of many diseases of the eye."

The visitor looked at the little man in amazement.

"Perhaps it was an oculist, not an editor, that you wanted to find," continued the little man as he handed him a paper. "Here's a copy of the Sawlog, just out, with advertisements of all our firms in that line."

"Ye--ye--yes, I understand," stammered the visitor, taking the paper, "but what's that got to do with it? I want to see the editor."

"Oh, I beg your pardon," apologized the little man. "You asked me if you could see him, and I thought you had some disease of the eye which affected its sight so that you could not see me, and simply dropped in, as many of our subscribers do, and are always welcome, to secure some information from the newspaper office respecting an affliction which, no doubt, was putting you to a great deal of trouble and no small expense in having the best medical and expert talent in determining whether you could or could not exercise the faculty, the most valuable of all the senses which a wise and beneficent Creator has——"

At this point the little man stopped.

His visitor had hurriedly put on his coat, pulled out his ax and left, and, turning to the foreman, he remarked:

"By cripes, Joe, that chap came mighty near cornering me that time. If it hadn't been for an inspiration he'd got me, sure. I'm going out now and get something for nervous shock, and you'd better load the old smoothbore with a few handfuls of assorted type in case Mr. Boanerges comes back again with a pair of spectacles on."

Then he went out the back door and slipped into the side entrance of a saloon and resturant.

DRUNK ON SUGAR FUMES.

A Saccharine Jag Produced In Stevedores Unloading Vessels.

The stevedores unloading sugar vessels at pier 30, South wharves, have been involuntarily indulging in what they call "sugar drunks," says the Philadelphia Record. It is a curious fact that the gasses arising from sugar that has been stored in a hold of a vessel without ventilation will produce a state of intoxication which might put to shame that produced by a jug of Kentucky "mountain dew". This saccharine "jag" is caused by merely breathing the air where the sugar has been stored, and while twenty minutes breathing in the open air is sufficient to work off its effects it is none the less a "jag".

While the barkentine John Swan was unloading a cargo of sugar at pier 30 it was noticed that quite a number of the stevedores working in the hold of the vessel were acting in a strange manner, as though under the influence of liquor. They were induced to go on deck, apparently in a beastly state of intoxication, but after a few minutes in the open air they recovered and continued their work.

John Duffy, one of the men affected, pronounced the sensation to be exactly similar to effects produced by drinking whisky. For awhile he felt stimulated, then began to grow exhilarated and hilarious. Shortly after that he began to get dizzy and stagger and finally lost all control of his mental and physical faculties, when he was removed to the open air and recovered shortly afterward.

The effects of the fumes have only been noticed early in the morning when the hatches are first removed. Gradually the current of air from the two hatches dissipates the gas and within an hour it disappears entirely, leaving only a disagreeable and penetrating odor and a sediment which penetrates every part of the vessel.

A Chinese Thief.

A retired sea captain relates that once while in China he spent one night ashore with another captain, when this adventure occurred: "I was awakened from a sound sleep by an agonized scream and a scuffle close to my head. Springing to the floor, I saw my friend grappling with a native thief, who was as naked as the day he was born. Before I could lend a hand the robber broke away and dashed through the open window a few feet from the ground, his long cue flying behind him. I turned and found my friend rolling on his couch in an ecstacy of pain. Making a light, I found that the flesh and skin had been torn clear away from the inside of one of his hands. The thief was prowling about the room when the captain awoke and made a grab at him. The fellow's naked body writhed out of his grasp like an eel. The captain caught the robber by the pig-tail, and then he was undone. The rascal had braided it full of fish-hooks, and the keen, barbed points just raked the flesh from the sailor's hand.

ONE SPOILED CHILD,

The Wasted Life of Payne Todd, Son of President Madison's Wife,

Mrs. Madison, besides being the widow of a President, who was also a wealthy planter, possessed some property in her own right, and her only son was originally a man of large fortune. It was this son that brought her to ruin, asserts the Richmond Dispatch. He was the child of her first husband, and his name was Payne Todd.

During the presidency of Mr. Madison he lived in the White House with them, a pretty, engaging lad, with a pleasing talent for mimicry.

Everybody liked, courted, petted and flattered him. When older he took to no serious occupation, and finally went to Europe, where he spent many idle years, wasting his fortune in extravagance.

On his return home he was no better. He did, indeed, buy an estate in Virginia, but at that time an estate in Virginia was of little value unless it was vigilantly looked after by the owner.

And so he wasted his life and his substance. After spending the whole of his own fortune, he allowed his mother to waste the whole of hers upon him, for she continued to the last to be dotingly fond of him.

She was obliged to sell Montpelier, and if Congress had not bought from her her husband's papers she must have been wholly dependent upon charity. The last words she uttered were: "My poor boy."

Two years after her death her son died of typhoid fever, carefully nursed to his last moment by the old servants of the family.

A WORLD-WONDERFUL OFFER.

The Weekly Pioneer Press, for one Year, and the Revised Encyclopedia Britannica for $7.50.

By a fortunate arrangement with the publishers of the Revised Encyclopedia Britannica, the Pioneer Press is enabled to make an offer which twelve months ago would have been regarded as impossible, not to say ridiculous.

Any one, parent or child, teacher or pupil, employer or employe, sending to the Pioneer Press Company, St. Paul, Minn., $7.50 will receive in return, and absolutely free of all delivery charges, the Weekly Pioneer Press for one year and a complete set of the Revised Encyclopedia Britannica.

This magnificent work is comprised in twenty octavo volumes of seven thousand pages, fourteen thousand columns and eight million words and has ninety-six maps, printed in colors. It is most emphatically "up to date" in all relating to art, literature and science, and has four thousand biographies of dead or living celebrities. It is the most complete dictionary of America extant and contains all the information of the Encyclopedia Britannica and hundreds of additional facts. It is pre-eminently modern and peculiarly correct.

No such offer was ever made by a newspaper before. No such offer could have been made one month ago. The twenty volumes are bound in heavy jute manilla; the paper of the printed pages is excellent, and the type, maps and illustrations are the same as used in the sheep, Russian or calf-skin bound editions.

Present subscribers to the Weekly Pioneer Press by sending $7.50 will receive the Encyclopedia as described above and will have their paper continued one year from the expiration of their present subscription.

No charge for delivery. You can send your distant friend the Weekly and the twenty volumes for $7.50.

Artistic Advertising.

Undoubtedly the Ivory Soap people deserve credit for the best grade of illustrations now being used for advertising purposes. The series of full-page drawings which have been appearing on the last page of the Century represents some of the most capable book and magazine artists in the country. The series must have cost no small figure. As yet the "way up" artists do not sign the work they do for advertisers, but I apprehend that it will not be long ere we shall see in the advertising columns such names as George Wharton Edwards, E. W. Kemble, etc. Such men as these bring to their work, besides mere mechanical skill, a trained imagination and an artistic conception of things. These qualities, when used in connection with advertisements, command scarcely less interest than when used in the ordinary literary way.—(Printer's Ink, August 19, 1891.

The Course of Empire,

The poet informs, is westward. Emigrants in that direction should be provided with Hostetter's Stomach Bitters as an antidote to malaria, the bane to newly settled clearings. Moreover, the peerless fortifying agent neutralizes the pernicious effect of damp and exposure, mental and bodily fatigue and nervous strain. Travelers, tourists, miners, navvies and mariners use it with advantage.

"German Syrup"

The majority of well-read physicians now believe that Consumption is a germ disease. In other words, instead of being in the constitution itself it is caused by innumerable small creatures living in the lungs having no business there and eating them away as caterpillars do the leaves of trees.

A Germ Disease.

The phlegm that is coughed up is those parts of the lungs which have been gnawed off and destroyed. These little bacilli, as the germs are called, are too small to be seen with the naked eye, but they are very much alive just the same, and enter the body in our food, in the air we breathe, and through the pores of the skin. Thence they get into the blood and finally arrive at the lungs where they fasten and increase with frightful rapidity. Then German Syrup comes in, loosens them, kills them, expells them, heals the places they leave, and so nourish and soothe that, in a short time consumptives become germ-proof and well.

PORTLAND, OREGON,

The Great Western Railway Terminus!

The Great Pacific Seaport City!

Real Estate is the Basis of all Wealth.

AN INVESTMENT THAT WILL NET.

20% to 30%

99 per cent. of those investing in Real Estate make money. 87 per cent. of those investing in Business lose money.

A commercial center is the safest place to invest in real estate, especially when such place is a great railway center; has good river transportation and large foreign and domestic shipping. Portland is that place.

Portland, Oregon, is now pre-eminently the commercial center of the Pacific Northwest. No other city in the United States is so well situated in respect to natural resources as is Portland, and it leads all other cities west of the Mississippi River in its phenomenal growth in population. Located at the confluence of two great rivers, and being the terminus of more transcontinental railways than any other city in the United States. In fact, every advantage which insures the solid growth and prosperity of a city is abundantly enjoyed by Portland.

These Advantages Guarantee Constantly Increasing Values in Real Estate.

THE PRESIDENTS.

Washington, the great and good,
Foremost of our Presidents stood.
Second, Senior Adams came,
Orator with words of flame.
Third was Jefferson, and he Wrote the words that made us free.
Madison, the fourth, came in
Followed by the battle's din;
With James Monroe as number five
Peace and harmony arrived.
Junior Adams, learned and great,
Number six, then ruled the State.
Jackson, bold, the seventh was he,
Often called "Old Hickory."
In war he won a victor's crown,
Then ruled in peace with great renown.
Van Buren next as number eight
Was seated in the chair of State.
Of Harrison, the ninth, we learn
His lamp of life soon ceased to burn;
And Tyler, tenth to take the seat,
His term of office did complete.
With Polk, eleven, our armies go
And fight the war with Mexico.
A general from the battles called
Was Taylor, twelfth, the next installed;
He died and Fillmore took his place,
The thirteenth President in the race.
Then Pierce, the fourteenth, ruled the land,
When passions raged on every hand.
Buchanan, the fifteenth, watched the cloud
That threatened war with thunders loud;
Great Lincoln, sixteenth, saves the realm,
When war clouds burst and nigh o'erwhelm.
He freed the slaves throughout the land,
And perished by the assassin's hand.
Then Johnson, seventeenth, took the chair.
The third Vice President seated there.
Eighteenth in line was Gen. Grant,
A man of deeds whose words were scant;
Great chieftain in the Union cause,
In peace he executes the laws.
And after him doth Hayes appear,
The nineteenth man, serene, sincere;
Who banished wine where he controlled,
And made the greenback good as gold.
Great Garfield then completes the score,
But falls a victim, wounded sore,
And 'mid a nation's tears and sighs,
Our second martyr President dies;
But Arthur rules with steady hand,
The twenty-first to take command;
And when at length his term expired,
And Cleveland took the oath required,
Then through the White House portals went
Our twenty-second President;
He braved the office-seeking storm,
The Civil Service to reform,
And with great zeal he did advance,
Then at the tariff hurled his lance,
But Harrison as twenty-third.
By our great nation was preferred;
The grandson of old "Tippecanoe"
In song renowned with "Tyler too."

TRICKING ROAD AGENTS.

Thirty-five Thousand Dollars Saved by a Cool Sacrifice.

Four of us—a young lady, governess in an officer's family; a wealthy merchant, middle-aged; the company's horseshoer, bound for the stables at Denver, and myself, Government assayer and mineral expert—had left Santa Fe, N. M., on the Santa Fe and Denver coach one scorching Summer afternoon. It was now about 2 o'clock in the morning. We had just congratulated ourselves on being safely out of the most dangerous passes, and were driving briskly toward the Canadian Fork.

The full moon lighted our way, making the bushes and trees adjacent cast sharp, decided shadows across the road. I had changed places with the little horseshoer on the roof for the sake of a little more air. The "insides" were dozing, but I felt wakeful and alert. We beguiled the sultry hours by story telling, says a correspondent of the Cincinnati Commercial-Gazette. Suddenly I saw something moving in the shadows ahead of us.

"What is that?" I said.

The driver looked, his eyes rounding like the moon. "Nothing but a burro," he replied, referring to the pack mules that frequently strayed down the mountain side. It disappeared quickly in the shade, and from thence, as if by magic, two men, the polished barrels of their rifles gleaming in the moonlight, sprang into the road.

They wore huge slouched sombreros and army cloaks. The stoutest of the pair caught the bridles of the leaders; the other, covering us with his Winchester, roared:

"Stir a finger an' yer dead men!" Advancing closer and keeping us within range of his muzzle, he shouted:

"Pitch out the treasure box, quick! We're in a hurry!"

The driver began to stammer a reply, but I stopped him with a muttered "Shut up. Let me talk to these chaps! There's no treasure aboard tonight!"

I said this coolly, at the same time swaying my body to and fro to get out of the range of the muzzle; the man was evidently very determined as well as very near. As I intended he should, he took me for an express messenger, and as neither driver nor messenger is supposed to possess any valuables, they are seldom molested.

"None o' yer nonsense!" replied the bandit. "Hand out the treasure or ye'll see trouble, blast yer!"

The scoundrel at the reins, who held his rifle pointed at me from between the horses's heads, evidently enjoyed my endeavors to get out of range, for he squeaked in a high falsetto voice: "Does them bar'ls look big?" "Yes," I said, echoing the old joke current among the miners, "I can read all the advertisements on the wadding!"

He gave a hoarse chuckle. "Hy'ar, hy'ar, heave out ther specie box!" roared the ruffian with the Winchester. I insisted there was none. "Here, look at the way bill; if there's any such thing aboard it it will be among the items," and I made a motion to get down, holding it in my hand.

"Stay where ye are, er I'll shoot yer d—n head off."

I threw him the way bill. He dropped his rifle, and picking it up, looked it over in the moonlight. Profiting by the action, I undertook to slip my pocketbook into my boot, and moved my hand round to get at the pocket. The driver, mistaking the movement, whispered. "Have you got one?" The man at the horses' heads noticed our little conference and yelled at us. The other instantly levelled his gun straight at my head; "None o' that! Hands up!"

We threw up our hands, and he again turned to the way bill. I did manage, though, to slip my money into my boot.

"You see there's no mention made of the treasure, and if it was sent it would certainly be noticed on the bill. However, you can get up and look at the box and satisfy yourself."

He hesitated a moment, then climbed up, rifle in hand, and looked in the box; in doing so he kicked my valise.

As a government expert, I was well known to the bankers of Santa Fe. They never hesitated to intrust me with large amounts of money, and this trip was no exception, I having with me nearly $15,000 in gold, secured partly in an inner belt around my waist, partly by a false bottom improvised in my valise by gumming strong wrapping paper over the precious parcels. "Open this hy'ar grip!" cried the road agent. I did so, carefully taking out its contents and letting him look inside; the wrapping paper deceived him.

"Naw," he growled, "thar's no treasure on this stage, but we've sworn ter have $200 tonight, an, ef we don't fin' it in your treasure box we mought fin' it in yer baggage. Who's inside?"

"Two men and a lady. None of them rich; one of them is a horseshoer going to Denver to shoe the company's horses."

"We'll look at 'em. Whatever happens don't yer move on yer life. We may find the cash on them ur in the baggage."

The "insides" appeared to be sleeping. The man rattled the door and roused them. Leveling his rifle, he ordered them out to be searched. They obeyed, apparently half asleep. He placed them in a row. "Hands up!" he said. "Now fur your pockets!"

The horseshoer had but two dollars in silver; the merchant's purse showed only ten and a few small bills, and the young lady's nothing but her papers and a little change. The poor girl looked as if about to faint.

"You're a ornary crowd ter have so little with yer," he snarled "an I've a good mind ter send yer all ter blazes this cussed night. Two hundred we've sworn to have, so we'll have ter rip up yer baggage." This was uttered with infinite disgust.

The merchant then spoke: "You'll find nothing of any account in our baggage, but if you will ask this lady for her hat, and can find the $1,000 in bills she concealed in it just before leaving Santa Fe, I think you will certainly consider youself repaid for your trouble."

The girl turned toward him with blazing eyes and uttered the word, "Traitor?" There was no escape; the hat was taken possession of. After the lining had been carefully ripped out it was returned with a few gruff words of apology.

"In luck, by heavens! cried the highwayman exultingly. Pile in, all, an' be d—d ter yer. Sorry fur yer loss, Miss, but we're bound to take all we kin git. We ain't got no treasure, but this here'll do 'bout as well. Drive on."

I want the way bill!" I said, excitedly, for the scene we had just witnessed had raised my indignation to fever heat. He handed it to me but it fluttered under the horses' feet, and I again demanded it. He picked it up, climbed to the wheel and handed it to me. Then turning to the young lady, he said, gruffly:

"But fur this lining, young woman, ye might ha' all been lyin' in yander ditch. No treasure aboard! Come this way agin 'thout it an' we'll settle yer accounts, blast yer! Now, git!"

We gladly followed his advice, but could not find language strong enough to express our opinion of the merchant. The driver made the air fairly lurid with his sulphurous profanity, and the young lady answered all attempts at consolation with hysterical sobs. The merchant alone appeared to retain his cool equanimity of temper.

Arriving at Denver, he begged very earnestly of the young lady, with me as her escort, to grant him a few moments for explanation in a private parlor. He pleaded so fervently that she gave a reluctant assent. He closed the door and bolted it, which looked a little strange.

"Don't be afraid," said he, as I felt for my revolver. Sitting down he took off his boot and from the toe took out a wad of bills. Said he. "My poor child, let me make restitution. "Here are $2.000 in bills for the $1,000 you lost"—handing her two one-thousand dollar bills—"your lining was a godsend to me. If they had searched me further they would have secured $20.000 instead of $1,000.

"And besides, concealed in my baggage are diamonds and other precious stones which, if they had secured them, would have beggared me." Taking a beautiful solitaire from his vest lining he presented that also to her. "I should have explained in the stage," he said, "but walls have ears, and why should I trust the others with my secrets?"—New York Recorder.

That Was All.

It seems that the word "gentleman" is subject, in one country at least, to the misconceptions so frequently attendant on the hardly-used term "lady," The author of "A Colonial Tramp" gives the following instance of such an absurd and mistaken phrasing:

When we were at Port Said, in passing down one of the side streets we missed our little guide for a moment, and as he had our parcels we looked round to see if he had not run off with them. Upon that we became aware of a dark, evil-looking and dirty half-cast of some kind, cuffing him about at an alley corner. We turned to give assistance to our little friend, and the bully left off and shuffled once more into shadow.

"Is that your father?" I asked, guessing at the fact for the reason that the boy had not resisted very much, and now he shook himself together without offering any explanation.

"My fader?" No, sar," with great scorn. "He one dirty thief-gentleman wanting the parcels, that's all."

"Oh, that's all, is it?"

"Yes, sar, he gentleman who waits at dark corners when Englishman pass at night, and stab."

AMMONIA IN BAKING POWDER.

Discussion Before the American Chemical Society.

To the Editor of The Tribune—Sir: I have just seen the report in your issue of Sept. 3 of the discussion at the Washington meeting of the American Chemical Society, Aug. 18, relative to the use of carbonate of ammonia in baking powders.

This report is incomplete and incorrect in many particulars, and as the paper which precipitated the discussion was read by me and was based upon my own experiments, I desire to make certain corrections in the interest of the truth and for the benefit of the large number of your readers to whom the question is one of great moment.

The paper as read before the society related that ammonia in baking powder is retained in the bread by reason of its affinity to the gluten. The consensus of opinion as expressed during the discussion was against the use of carbonate of ammonia in baking powder with the only exception of Dr. McMurtrie, who is now an employe of a baking powder company which uses carbonate of ammonia in its baking powder.

Of the other parties mentioned as having taken part in the discussion were Prof. Dr. Barker of the University of Pennsylvania, who is the President of the society and one of our highest authorities. In answer to a pleading by Prof. McMurtrie that only small quantities of ammonia were used in baking powders, he stated: "No matter how small the quantity, I must decline to be dosed medically without my consent when taking my meals."

Dr. E. H. Bartley, formerly chemist of the Brooklyn Board of Health and Professor of Chemistry at the Long Island College, likewise named, did not, I believe, take active part in the discussion. but is already on record as strongly opposed to the use of ammonium carbonate in baking powders.

Dr. Richardson volunteered only the question whether the flour used in the experiments was of good quality, of which I assured him by stating that it was the best and the flour used in my family.

Prof. Mallet was not present.

Your article is misleading in so far as it gives the impression that ammonia disappears on baking. My actual tests agree with those made by others, showing that ammonia remains in the bread. My investigations simply assign a new cause for its retention.

New York Tribune, Sept. 17, 1891.

Note—Dr. Endemann, the writer of this communication, is well known in scientific circles, and was for twelve years chemist of the New York Board of Health.

The Baking Powder company above referred to is the Royal Baking Powder company of New York.

And the employe, Dr. William McMurtrie, who defends that company's use of ammonia, is their much advertised Government Authority.

WHY THEY WANTED HER.

Not Because She Was Handsome nor Because Her Pa Was Rich.

There was rejoicing in the McGilway household, such rejoicing as is rarely known save when a boy baby is born or papa's named a winner. Cook forgot to be cross and the parrot in the front window sang sweet nothings unmolested to the small boys on the fence.

Down in his office Pa McGilway winked his matrimonial eye. In my lady's chamber was the busy hum of the sewing machine and the eternal chatter of the dressmaker with her mouth full of pins.

In the train coming home from college was Abbie, the daughter of the house, the pride of her father and the joy of her mother's heart. Dear, clever Abbie, a baby yesterday it seems to them, and yet to-day a woman grown, graduated from college and coming home with honors heaped upon her.

But not for long was darling Abbie coming to make glad the hearts of her parents and to cause the home of her childhood to bloom like a sweet syringa bush with her presence.

In that long, cool parlor, where the white lace curtains fluttered in the June breeze and great bunches of June roses waited to challenge the coming girl to the test of rival sweetness, there sat that day in silence ten young men. With hats in hand, all save one were breathing sorrowful maledictions against the others for being nearer the door than they.

Since early morn they had sat there, waiting the coming of her at whose feet were to be laid the ten hearts and ten fortunes here represented.

She was not so beautiful a girl, this coming queen, nor yet was Pa McGilway so rich a man. It was the fame of Abbie's graduating essay that had served as a lure to the most eligible men in town, explains the New York Commercial Advertiser, "How to Keep House on $10 a week," Miss Abbie McGilway.

Strange Superstition in Russia.

A curious case of gross superstition recently brought before the Criminal Sessions Court at Samara, in Russia. Six peasants were tried and sentenced to imprisonment for terms of various duration up to four months for deliberately disinterring the body of a woman who had died of intoxication and floating it down the Volga as a means of causing rain. It seems to be quite a fixed belief among the Russian peasantry that throwing the dead body of a drunkard into the river is a sure cure for want of rain.

From the blossom of health,
To the paleness of death."

When sudden fainting spells come upon a lady, you may always suspect some uterine disturbances or trouble, or some great disorder in the circulation and nerve centers. A remedy that has always proved successful in warding off and removing the tendency to a recurrence of fainting spells—that removes the cause of them, corrects the circulation of blood, and gives to the system that even running nervous energy so essential, is Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription.

The "Prescription" is guaranteed to give satisfaction in every case, or money refunded. Nothing else does as much. You only pay for the good you get. Can you ask more?

As a regulator and promoter of functional action, at the critical period of change from girlhood to womanhood, "Favorite Prescription" is a perfectly safe remedial agent, and can produce only good results. It is equally efficacious and valuable in its effects when taken for those disorders and derangements incident to that later and most critical period, known as "The change of Life."

PIONEER PRESS BUREAU OF CLAIMS.

Indian Depredation Claims.

Persons who have lost property from Indian raids should file their claims under the Indian Depredation Act of March 3, 1891. The time is limited, and the claims are taken up by the court in the order in which they are received.

TAKE NOTICE THAT ALL CONTRACTS ENTERED INTO WITH ATTORNEYS PRIOR TO THE ACT ARE MADE NULL AND VOID.

Information given and all claims promptly attended to.

Patents for Inventions

Equal with the interest of those having claims against the Government is that of INVENTORS, who often lose the benefit of valuable inventions because of the incompetency or inattention of the attorneys employed to obtain their patents. Too much care cannot be exercised in employing competent and reliable solicitors to procure patents, for the value of a patent depends greatly, if not entirely, upon the care and skill of the attorney.

With the view of protecting inventors from worthless or careless attorneys, and of seeing that inventions are well protected by valid patents, the PIONEER PRESS BUREAU has retained counsel expert in patent practice, and is therefore prepared to Obtain patents,

Conduct interferences,
Make special examinations,
Prosecute rejected cases,
Register trade marks and copyrights,
Render opinions as to scope and validity of patents,
Prosecute and defend infringement suits, etc. etc.

If you have an invention on hand send THE PIONEER PRESS BUREAU a sketch or photograph thereof, together with a brief description of the important features, and you will be at once advised as to the best course to pursue. Models are not necessary unless the invention is of a complicated nature. If others are infringing on your rights, or if you are charged with infringement by others, submit the matter to THE BUREAU for a reliable OPINION before acting on the matter.

PENSIONS

Pensions procured for soldiers of the Rebellion who served 90 days and are NOW disabled from ANY cause. This pension is payable whether the disability way incurred before, during or since service. Pensions for widows and children without regard to cause of soldier's death. Pensions for mothers and fathers who are NOW dependent, whether they were dependent on soldier when he died or not. Widows, children and parents are regarded as "dependent" in all cases where they have not sufficient income from property for their support.

Soldiers pensioned at less than twelve ($12.00) dollars per month and suffering from disability in addition to that named in their pension certificate, may obtain increase under the new law.

Information and advice given without charge. Best facilities ever offered to claimants to have their claims properly and diligently prosecuted. No charges unless successful. Write for information.

lightfully romantic in it. I shouldn't mind the journey with such an object at the end of it."

He went away without seeing her again. As the distance grew between them his impressions of her unique grace and innocence took clearer form, and he spent many hours studying them. She was so unlike any girl he had ever known, so gentle and sweet and yet so spirited and clever.

When he was gone Rosalie missed him in an indefinite sort of way, which made the streets of Chicago glare and the long rows of heavy buildings frown in a way she had not noticed before.

From Chicago to Put-in-Bay, thence to Saratoga, thence to Newport, staying some weeks at each place, and finally to New York city in September, our three southerners leisurely wandered. The day on which they sailed for Savannah was unusually cold, and the streets were heaped with snow. They were glad to set their faces to the south. The voyage proved a pleasant one, however, and they reached their destination in the midst of a season of sunshine and of balmy breezes.

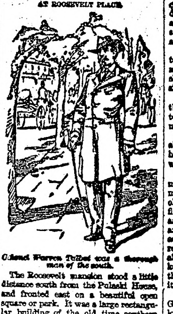
In due time dispatches and letters were received from Edgar Julian, announcing his success with the Dutch syndicate. He would not be home immediately (this was written to Mr. Largely at Chicago), as he had determined on a tour in the south of France.

It was while in New York that Mrs. Roosevelt handed Rosalie a paper in which was printed a circumstantial account of a raid made by government officials on an extensive illicit distillery situated in a secluded valley of northern Georgia known as the "pocket." The raid had been quite successful. The distillery was demolished and a considerable amount of spirits seized. The supposed controller of this celebrated moonshine establishment, one Frank Ellis, had escaped. It was supposed that he had amassed quite a fortune from his distillery before it was destroyed. He was described as a young man of good family, handsome, bold, well educated and exceedingly clever in conducting his operations.

A few days later Rosalie received letters from home, but not a word of reference to Frank Ellis or of the revenue raid was in any of them.

CHAPTER IX.

AT ROOSEVELT PLACE.



Colonel Warren Talbot was a thorough man of the south.

The Roosevelt mansion stood a little distance south from the Pulaski House, and fronted east on a beautiful open square or park. It was a large rectangular building of the old time southern architecture, surrounded by rows of palmetto trees and gnarled live oaks.

In the days of slavery, when Mr. Roosevelt and his wife were young, this house was filled with notable guests, artists and literary folk chiefly, who spent the winter months in a round of gay, but quiet and elegant, social pleasures.

The only change that the war and its sequels had brought to this fine old house was the discontinuance of its liberal hospitalities, not on account of its owner's reduced means, but because of the general gloom and poverty which had rendered society moody, retrospective and bitter.

The Roosevelts had managed to keep together a little coterie of immediate friends to whom they dispensed a liberal hospitality in something like the old southern style, but none of their northern friends had returned since the war. No doubt many of the latter were dead, and the rest swept past Savannah every winter in the gay stream of pleasure hunters going to Jacksonville, Fernandina and the upper waters of the St. John's.

Mrs. Roosevelt dreamed of making Rosalie the means of relighting the social fires in her house, and she was not disappointed. The strong and merry mountain girl brought a breath of the up country with her. She had her hours of homesickness, it is true, and cried over her father's letters; but she rallied readily, taking up her cheerfulness and girlish activity where she left off, and making the most of the opportunities her surroundings offered. She was, in some indefinite way, aware that she was taking into her life some new and powerful elements. She had been delighted with Chicago, she was enraptured by Savannah.

In a little while she had made acquaintances among the young people or her aunt's set, one of them, Mildred Fain, becoming her devoted friend. Miss Fain was three years older than Rosalie, a petite brunette, with finely cut features and a faultless grace of manner. Her family traced itself back to the early days of the city, where it was honorably connected with colonial history. Her grandfather had been a cabinet officer or something of the sort under a Democratic administration, and her father had fallen, a distinguished Confederate general, in one of the terrible battles of the Virginia campaigns. In many points she was quite Rosalie's opposite.

Rosalie loved her from the beginning; and in fact that sweet affection that girls have for each other was quickly formed between them, greatly exaggerated by their wholly opposite temperaments and characteristic elements. They found in each other something new and fascinating, quite unlike what usually draws girls together. They soon fully confided in each other; and so Rosalie discovered that Miss Fain had a lover, a Colonel Warren Talbot, lawyer and politician, whose name seemed much honored by the daily newspapers of Savannah. This young man often dropped in at the Roosevelt mansion to smoke and chat awhile with Mr. Roosevelt, but it chanced to be some weeks after her first momentary meeting with him that Rosalie found herself in conversation with him on the broad veranda. It was the merest accident, this little tete-a-tete, but Colonel Warren Talbot found it a most charming bit of experience.

"What a delightfully naive and pretty girl your new friend is!" he said to Miss Fain soon after.

"I'm quite charmed that you think so," responded that young lady; "she is the sweetest girl I ever saw, and she knows so much, and is so brilliant, too, and so good and kind, and altogether unlike any other girl I ever saw."

"Oh," exclaimed the colonel gayly, "you are an accomplished eulogist. Go on, however—it is a bird singing of a bird, one flower shaking out its perfume on another—it's all very beautiful."

The next time he went to Roosevelt place he again talked with Rosalie. He had not been much in the north, and her vivid descriptions of the great cities and the social whirlpools into which she had merely dipped while there were to him as charming as anything of the sort could be, and they gave him as immediate an impression of western power and eastern agility as if they had been sketches and photographs of the scenes and persons mentioned.

"I like those people," she said in a tone of enthusiasm; "their vim and movement, their alert eyes and bright shrewd faces, give one the idea of irresistible energy."

"Then you like the north better than the south?" he remarked in a careless tone, but fixing his eyes questioningly upon her.

"No, sir. I like the south immeasurably better," she quickly responded, a half suppressed rebuke coming with her words.

Colonel Warren Talbot was a thorough man of the south, both physically and mentally. Tall, well proportioned, with olive complexion and large, dark eyes, finely cut features, black hair, mustache and imperial, a refined, haughty bearing and a voice possessed of all the passionate music of the low country, he was a representative of the long boasted chivalry which in the proud days of slavery kept alive the medieval fires and enthroned physical courage and literal purity at the expense of liberal humanities.

"As compared with your north Georgia mountains, how do you like our low country?" he presently said, as if to change the subject.

"Oh, I cannot compare the two, they are so different. But I am charmed with everything here. Our life in the 'pocket' is sweet and drowsy, much as it is here; but there we have no society, no beautiful homes, no tropical things, no churches, no theaters." She said this in a voice indicative of retrospection. A vision of the old mill was hovering before her. She heard the water bubbling over the big mossy wheel.

"Your aunt, Mrs. Roosevelt, has been describing the 'pocket' and the mill to me," he said, "and I imagine you must have found life there delightfully calm and uneventful, almost Arcadian, in its simplicity and evenness."

"Would you call an uneventful and simple life delightful?" she demanded, looking quickly and earnestly into his face.

He hesitated a moment and then said frankly:

"No, I like excitement."

"So do I," she exclaimed, with a little flush in her cheeks. "That is why I like the north. It is all excitement."

"Well, Savannah will not be so dull after a few weeks," he said, in the tone of one who apologizes; "when the northern tourists begin to arrive they will make quite a movement in our streets and parks."

He had risen while speaking, and was now standing before her as if in the act of going, his tall, singularly erect form outlined against the clump of banana stalks. She felt the effect of his personal magnetism, in some indefinable way, without the slightest thought of what it was. He was regarding her with grave, clouded eyes. He felt bewildered by her rare beauty. She seemed to him as fresh and pure and simply sweet as some dew-dashed mountain violet.

"But Savannah doesn't appear dull to me," she said, rising to say goodby; "it is quite interesting. I am going to like it ever so much."

"That is very kind of you, Miss Chenier," he said, bowing low over the exquisite little hand she gave him.

"Come to see us often," she naively added. "You know my aunt has made me the mistress of Roosevelt Place, and I intend to be exceedingly hospitable."

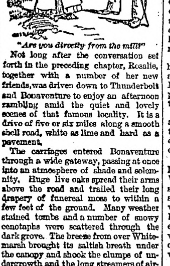
"I have been coming here since my earliest boyhood," he said. "I am glad I shall have a continuance of the privilege. This house has always had a strange charm for me, quite apart from the social and hospitable aspect."

"It is a place one grows attached to at once, a sort of dream palace. I have really found myself half expecting to come across the old lamp of Aladdin among my aunt's bric-a-brac." She said this very lightly, but Colonel Talbot's warm imagination seized the suggestion, and he silently wondered if this simple child of the mountains would not indeed find some source of magic hidden away in this vast twilight place to glorify her life withal.

He went away, bearing with him a semiconsciousness of a sweet influence caught from her. The light of her eyes, the low melody of her voice, with its slight up country peculiarities, and the gleam of her pale gold hair lingered in his mind. He walked along in the shady street under the china trees and the moss hung live oaks, with his eyes bent upon the ground. He did not see Miss Fain and her mother as they slowly were driven by in an open landau.

CHAPTER X.

A SUBURBAN DRIVE.



"Are you directly from the mill?"

Not long after the conversation set forth in the preceding chapter, Rosalie, together with a number of her new friends, was driven down to Thunderbolt and Bonaventure to enjoy an afternoon rambling amid the quiet and lovely scenes of that famous locality. It is a drive of five or six miles along a smooth shell road, white as lime and hard as a pavement.

The carriages entered Bonaventure through a wide gateway, passing at once into an atmosphere of shade and solemnity. Huge live oaks spread their arms above the road and trailed their long drapery of funereal moss to within a few feet of the ground. Many weather stained tombs and a number of snowy cenotaphs were scattered through the dark grove. The breeze from over Whitemarsh brought its saltish breath under the canopy and shook the clumps of undergrowth and the long streamers of air plant. A broad creek or arm of the river, in which the tide was at the flood, came in sight at the end of long vistas, shining with the bluish gleam of silver. But even here in this heavy shade, with the breeze washing through, there was a pervading heat, a palpitating current of summer fervor which thrilled through the blood like strong wine. Rosalie leaned out of the carriage, and for a moment Colonel Talbot, from his place in another vehicle, saw her bright hair tossed about her forehead by the wind and her happy face turned by merest chance toward him. The next motion of the carriage shut out the vision. He turned to his nearest companion, a Mrs. Farley (tall, dignified and a widow), and half closing his eyes said:

"Miss Chenier is a singularly beautiful girl, I think."

"Yes, quite pretty and sweet," Mrs. Farley replied, "and I daresay good."

Colonel Talbot smiled as if he thoroughly understood the guarded phrasing of his companion's speech. He added:

"She's extremely clever, too, or"——

"Unsophisticated," interrupted Mrs. Farley.

"Yes, I should have said that; but she is very interesting. She has decided opinions of her own, and expresses them with a sincerity and readiness as refreshing as an up country breeze."

"Oh, is she strongminded?"

"Not in the sense you suggest. She is not obtrusive. She is charmingly naive and original in conversation, taking one unaware with her questions and suggestions, like a child. I suspect that she's a genuine mountain violet, fresh, sweet and"——

"Don't, Colonel Talbot," cried Mrs. Farley; "keep some of the adjectives for future use. I can interpret your feelings without any further waste of words."

"Your interpretation would be as far from correct as any guess of the pragmatists who pretend to explain the beautiful myths of the old poets," he said, looking away and stroking his long mustache.

"I should not turn your poetry into prose at all," she added softly; "I should give it a very deep and tender meaning."

"Deep and tender," he repeated, "those are adjectives, I believe. You may reserve them for future use. I imagine Miss Chenier has a mountaineer for a lover, a strong, bold young fellow of the true north Georgian type."

"Oh, no doubt of it; but she'll soon forget him now," she replied.

"Girls usually do," he said dryly.

They all got out of their carriages and were soon scattered about among the tombs and flower beds of that incomparably beautiful old place.

Rosalie sat down alone on the verge of the bluff in the shade of a tree. She, who from childhood had reveled in wind, was fascinated with this steady breeze from the sea. The broad areas of silver and emerald spread out before her, the bright sky above, and the picturesque clumps of palmetto trees in the distance suited the mood into which the drive through the cemetery had led her. It chanced that her friends wandered away from where she sat, so that she was quite alone when a tall man approached and stopped within a few feet of her. She instantly recognized Frank Ellis, notwithstanding his changed appearance. He was no longer a mountaineer or a "moonshiner" in dress, being fashionably and tastefully clad. He bore in his hand a small cane. It seemed that he did not at once make sure of his right to speak. Rosalie had not changed much, it is true, but she hardly looked like the coarsely dressed miller girl of the "pocket," as she sat there arrayed in the latest and most elegant style of walking dress. She rose at once and a quick flush came into her cheeks.

"Ah, Miss Chenier," he said in those old fluent tones, so persuasive and melodious, "you have not forgotten me, I hope."

"Oh, no, Mr. Ellis, I am glad to see you," she responded, taking a step or two forward and holding out her hand to him. "Are you directly from the mill?"

"No," he said, "I have been here for some time. I am a resident of Savannah now. But you were the last person I was expecting to meet today. You are not alone?"

He had taken her hand and was holding it while he looked down into her upturned beautiful face, all rosy with the emotion of thus unexpectedly meeting a friend from the "pocket" with news from home possibly.

"Then you haven't seen papa recently?" she inquired, without noticing his own question.

"No," he answered; "I had trouble with the revenue men. They destroyed my manufactory, and I had a close struggle for my liberty."

"I remember," she said; "I saw it in a paper."

"It's quite settled now," he added. "I compromised with them—bribed them, in other words, and so am quite free again. I have opened a broker's office here in Savannah." He spoke with the confident freedom of a man well grounded in his own estimation and full of assurance that he should get on well with others. He stood erect—strong, defiant, handsome. His eyes had lost the old restlessness and watchfulness.

As they stood thus, he holding her hand, they made a very striking picture, and a very strange one to the eyes of Miss Mildred Fain, who just then approached them, and stopped as she noticed the stranger.

Rosalie quickly withdrew her hand and turned, all flushed as she was, in time to see the look of half surprise, half deprecation which passed across the face of Mildred.

"Come here, Mildred," she said quickly; "this is a friend from the 'pocket.' We met here by the merest chance." A self consciousness of manner rather than self consciousness in fact put her in a wrong light before both Ellis and Miss Fain. It was as if she had been discovered in some compromising situation, when, in truth, she was wholly unaware of any improper appearance connected with what her friend had just seen.

At this moment Aunt Marguerite joined them. Her sharp little eyes recognized Ellis promptly, and a gleam almost malignant shot out from them. She stopped short, close to him, and with a quick glance from head to foot took in the great improvement in his personal appearance. Her mind worked with that swiftness and certainty so valuable in a sudden crisis. The first impulse was to ignore him and hurry Rosalie away from his presence; but caution whispered her that this might arouse that perversity for which young girls who fancy themselves in love are noted. Then, too, Miss Fain was present, and there might be a scene. She changed her manner in a moment.

"Why, Mr. Ellis, this is quite a surprise," she said in that cold, half careless tone which is used toward one who is a mere valueless acquaintance. She gave him her hand, however, and turned toward Miss Fain, but she had walked away.

"I am glad to see you looking so well, Mrs. Roosevelt," he said, throwing into his voice an irresistible music. "Your summer sojourn in the north must have been pleasant. Is Mr. Roosevelt well?"

"Yes, quite, thank you." She dared not trust herself to say more.

He was ready, however, and went easily forward into graceful talk, drawing her out in spite of herself, and, after a manner, winning upon her interest if not her respect. He was a charming talker in every way, and his knowledge of human nature was broad and accurate.

Colonel Talbot and Mrs. Farley had seated themselves on a log, the bole of a tree cut down in the course of some improvement of the grounds, and were surveying the wide expanse of water, islands and marshes through an opera glass. While Mrs. Farley was thus amusing herself she chanced to bring the glass to bear on the group by the river, composed of Rosalie and young Ellis. He was holding her hand and gazing intently down into her face. It was a very suggestive situation. Mrs. Farley did not know who the young man was, but she could be sure he was a lover, she thought. After looking for a moment she handed the glass to Colonel Talbot, and pointing in the direction, said:

"See if you can make out the young

The tennis girl goes out to play her nerve producing game; the flippant girl goes larking because her life's too tame; the reading girl betakes herself into a world of books; the scheming girl to seaside goes to fish with artful hooks; the flirting girl goes anywhere she thinks there is a man; the dressy girl to Paris to buy a dress and fan; the beauty goes upon the stage to show her handsome looks; but the girl that gets a husband stays right home and cooks.—Crookston Tribune.

Thrashing has been almost entirely suspended during the past week. Work has again begun but the skies are threatening and another fall of rain is imminent. Stacking has been done to a large extent the past couple of weeks but thousands of acres still remain in shock at the mercy of the elements.

What has become of our band?

The agitation of St. Hilaire people for a daily mail has borne fruit, a daily mail route having been established between Crookston, Wylie and St. Hilaire. On Mondays, Wednesdays and Fridays, the mail will be carried by the Great Northern as usual, but on Tuesdays, Thursdays and Saturdays the mail will be carried by stage.

ON the summit of Ben Lomond may be seen the smallest tree that grows in Great Britain. It is known as the dwarf willow, and is, when mature, only about two inches in height.

THE printing of votes in German in Cincinnati is a novelty, but not an improvement. Plain United States is good enough for any voter, and if any other language is allowed there can be no limit.

HENRY M. STANLEY says a man's wife is too sacred for the world to know and discuss, hence he is not willing to have his wife paint, publish a book, or in any way attract public attention.

THE artificial incubation of eggs originated in Egypt, where it is still carried on. According to a consular report no fewer than 75,000,000 eggs are hatched in this way every year on the banks of the Nile.

SOME impudent cad stepped into a London bank the other day and carried off $500,000. Scotland Yard has been notified and the detectives will take official cognizance of the case as soon as the necessary formalities have been complied with.

THE way Europe is rushing for our breadstuffs may be seen in the fact that Philadelphia exported $1,984,977 worth of cereals during the month of August, as compared with $427,301 during the corresponding month in 1890. Europe's loss is America's gain this year.

A NEW musical light is shining in Germany so strong in the eyes of its admirers as to put Wagner's in the shade. Paul Geisler has made a sensation with his opera, "The Knights of Marienburg." He writes his librettos, and as a composer is said to have really striking musical individuality.

THE banana belongs to the lily family and is a developed tropical lily from which the seeds have been eliminated. It possesses all the essentials to the sustenance of life. Ground that will grow ninety pounds of potatoes will grow 4,000 pounds of bananas.

THE attendance upon the public schools in San Francisco last year was 374 less than in 1885. For the last seven years the attendance has been stationary owing to the development of parochial and church schools. The city claims to pay teachers higher average salaries than any other city in the country.

As yet nobody seems to have discovered any incongruity in the statement which has been going the rounds for about a week, that "the richest gold mines in Alaska have been found to be on the British side of the line." In that case they are not in Alaska at all, but in British Columbia. However, they enable Canada to offer us one more inducement to consent to annexation.

A GEORGIA boy and girl aged respectively 15 and 14 years were married the other day, but the parents arrived on the scene immediately after the ceremony, trounced the wedded pair, and took them home sorrowing. Why the commendable work of thrashing the person who performed the ceremony was neglected the correspondents fail to state

MILLARD FILLMORE's sister, Mrs. Julia F. Harris, who died lately in San Francisco, thus addresses her son in her will: "I shall be no less your mother on the spirit side of life than now. My love will bring me near you to suggest, impress, and encourage you in the fulfilment of every honest obligation and duty, and I rely on you to reward my fondest expectations by a faithful discharge of all the trusts I have put in your handa" Mrs. Harris lived with her brother in the White House at one time.

CAPTAIN WEBBER, of the schooner J. G. Craig of Portland, Me., tells a remarkable cat story. The cat in question belonged on a vessel, and though petted by the captain, was disliked by some of the crew. One day recently, while the vessel was between Monhegan and Pomaquid Point, one of the men threw the cat overboard and everybody supposed that was the last of poor pussy. A week afterward, however, when captain Webber arrived home, the cat came purring down the garden to meet him. The captain can't explain how the cat got ashore, but knows that she is ashore and as good as new.

A barn belonging to Mrs. Levi Greeley at Gary, was set on fire by children, and the barn, dwelling, forty tons of hay and ninety sheep were burned.

A steam threshing engine exploded at Claremont, blowing Engineer Albert Chichester sixty-four feet breaking several bones and inflicting other injuries that may prove fatal.

Richard Scholz, while quarreling with Charles Ahlgrin at Horsehead, over a small bill, injured the latter so severely that death ensued and Scholz is in jail for murder.

Driven insane by poverty, Mrs. Neprosch, wife of a laboring man at Sioux Falls, attempted to drown herself and two children. The children were saved, but the woman is in a critical condition.

Rev. Mr. Chapin of Howell, has just presented the Mitchell Y. M. C. A. with a corner lot on Main street, worth $2,000. The association will take steps to put up a valuable block on the site in the near future.

Julia Rivers, a woman of the town, was found in her house at Pierre, dead. The inquest showed she had met death by accidentally taking an overdose of morphine. Deceased was formerly an educated, beautiful woman, and had prominent relatives living in Chicago.

Frank S. Lusk, formerly with D. D. Streeter & Co., railroad contractors in the Black Hills, now of Lusk, Wyo., was arrested at Deadwood by the United States deputy marshal for selling and disposing of oleomargarine without a government license. He was held under $1,500 bail.

John B. Lehman, who was convicted at Custer City a year ago for the murder of Constable Burns and sentenced to be hung, the supreme court of the state having affirmed the decision, was sentenced by Judge Chas. M. Thomas to be hung on the 4th of November next.

The high winds caused serious havoc with threshing machines in the vicinity of Britton. On the farm of Joseph Miller, three miles west of town, a separator belonging to E. B. Karn caught fire from the sparks from the engine. It with several stacks of wheat was destroyed. Three miles north of this farm a similar disaster occurred. The threshing machine of Bent Bearson and 300 bushels of wheat belonging to Albert Bundrock were burned.

A special from Marion Junction says: Here, as all through the Northwest, the weather has been extremely hot the past two weeks. Danger from fire presents itself on every side, though there has been but little damage so far. The Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway company has issued orders to engineers to stop and furnish water from the engine when required to put out fires that possibly may catch along the road. While the right-of-way is burned off fifty feet each side of the track the high winds are liable to carry a spark 100 or 200 feet or more from the track. Everything is combustible, being dry as tinder.

NORTH DAKOTA.

A Republican paper has been started at Cogswell, by W. S. Straub.

George W. Johnson, a farmer in Emmons County, was burned to death in a prairie fire.

A terrible prairie fire is raging six miles east of Oakes. Damage to stacked and shocked grain is very heavy. One man is reported burned fatally.

The deer at Sherwood Forest, Green Lake, have had an addition to their number. The old doe Gretchen recently gave birth to two nice little ones that are as cunning and pretty as a pair of pictures.

Edward Popke and his wife, of Seymour, were each sentenced to one year in prison at Eau Claire for causing the death of their baby by cruel treatment, when it was scarcely three hours old. They had pleaded guilty. The wife is only about 16 years old.

A highwayman held up John Shafer and Thomas Yelinek, at Prairie du Chien, and at the point of a pistol made them give up their money and take their clothes, shoes and stockings off, and then made them drive back to the Artesian Park. Here the robber jumped out and said he would kill them if they attempted to follow or tried to see and recognize him.

IOWA.

The body of a murdered man, a railroad track laborer, has been found near Wheatland. The man, whose name cannot be learned, had just drawn his pay.

J. O. Archer, a brakeman on the Illinois Central, was killed by falling between the cars of his train when just east of Ackley. He leaves a wife and two children.

Stephen Elgar, a prominent resident of Plattville, Wis., committed suicide at Dubuque by shooting himself. Ill health was the cause. He left a letter directed to his wife asking forgiveness for his act.

The Times of Dubuque has commenced issuing an evening edition of the same size as the morning edition, which will be continued hereafter. This movement has been in contemplation for some time.

During the high wind the steam thresher of W. W. Williams set fire to the grain of a farmer east of Lime Springs, while the men had gone to dinner. The separator, and eight large stacks were burned with stabling. Damage $1,500.

Frank Woodworth, a conductor on the Chicago & Northwestern, was knocked off a freight car at Sioux City by striking a bridge over which his train was running. He fell sixty feet into the river and was instantly killed.

The 6th regiment Iowa national guards held an election to choose a major to succeed J. M. Emsig, of Le Mars, resigned. From companies already heard from there is no opposition to the candidacy of Capt. James Rule, of Mason City and his election is almost certain.

A wild freight train on the Chicago & Northwestern crashed into a passenger train near Beverly, a few miles out from Cedar Rapids. The engines are both total wrecks and some of the cars were badly damaged. Outside of severe bruises no one was hurt.

The preliminary hearing in the Larson case at Mason City has already consumed nine days. There are rumors that Darrow's wife has made a confession to a detective stating that her husband killed Darrow with an ax, threw him into a buggy and drove him away.

The Northwest German conference assembled in Charles City recently with Bishop Foss presiding. It includes the north half of Iowa, South Dakota and part of Wisconsin and Illinois. Nearly all the members were present. Delegates were to be chosen to the general conference. A good number of lay delegates were present.

F. D. Wilson, deputy United States marshal at Tacoma, Wash., arrested James Durwood, alias James Geer, at Cedar Rapids. Durwood was arrested last winter while robbing a bonded car of canned salmon from Tacoma to Canada, but escaped before the grand jury met. Nearly five weeks Wilson has been following Durwood almost over the entire country.

BULWER'S REPARTEE.

Wit Passed Between the Novelist and Lord Palmerston.

In reading in last Sunday's Times Richard B. Kimball's interesting account of Bulwer, I was reminded of an incident that happened in parliament in July 1855, which illustrates the great novelist's good humor and quickness of repartee. A kinsman, McHillingfleetcazley, a member of parliament for the North Riding of York from 1832 to 1862, had taken me into the house—strangers' gallery—and was showing me the celebrities. Of course, I was anxious to see the author of "Pelham"—I was only a boy then—and I was fortunate enough to hear him, too.

It happened thus: The debate was on Lord John, afterward earl, Russel's ignominious failure during his mission at Vienna to bring the Crimean war to an end, and the opposition was very strong against the party in power. At last Lord Palmerston, then prime minister, rose and got to talking in a hectoring way about "this unnecessary and unprovoked attack upon the government," and ended by saying in a loud voice and looking straight at the two literary members—Bulwer and Disraeil—who were sitting together on the front of the opposition bench:

"The gentlemen are making 'Much Ado About Nothing.' "

He sat down amid loud cheers from his own side; but in an instant Bulwer was up, and with exquisite grace and sarcasm said:

"Mr. Speaker"—then turning to how slightly toward the treasury bench—"I beg to remind the noble lord that in chronological order 'Much Ado About nothing' comes after the 'Comedy of Errors.' "

I leave readers of Shakespeare to imagine the tumultuous "Hear!" "Hear!" "Hear!" from the conservative side and the laughter all over the house.—New York Times.

HE HELPED HIMSELF.

How a Man Assisted One in Distress.

A gentleman one day was driving along a lonely country road when he heard loud cries for help proceeding from a neighboring grove. He hitched his horse and ran to the assistance of the person who seemed to be in distress. Upon entering the wood he was surprised and shocked to find a man who was securely tied to a tree. "What is the matter here?" he said in astonishment.

"Oh, sir," replied the poor fellow, "I'm so glad you have come. A few hours ago I was knocked down by some tramps, who rifled my pockets, and after stealing everything I had except a pocketbook in my inside vest pocket, which they fortunately overlooked, bound me to this tree and decamped."

"The scoundrels!" ejaculated the new-comer. "And so the wretches robbed you, eh?"

"Yes, sir."

"Took everything you had except one pocketbook in your inside pocket, eh?"

"Yes, sir."

"The villains! And afterwards they tied you here?"

"Yes, sir."

"And are you still tied—tied tightly—so tightly that you cannot escape?"

"Yes, sir."

"Then I think I'll take the pocketbook the other fellows left." And he did.

A SECRET MEETING.

An Extended Consultation Between the President and a Number of High Officials.

Some of the Belief That the Unsettled Affairs in Chili Demand Immediate Attention.

WASHINGTON, Special Telegram, Sept. 29.—There is a great deal of guesswork about the conference at the White House to-day, many believing that it was not all about Chili, although the press associations and other newspaper men are so sending it out.

The other theory is that the difficulties in China are what were discussed at the conference, and there are good reasons for so believing. There is said to be nothing in Chilian affairs calling for civil action by this government. The fact that the navy department has been trying to reach the San Francisco, now going up the coast, indicates that she is wanted for something immediately.

John W. Foster, who was at the conference, is an agent in Chinese affairs and a general diplomat. By those who claim to have inside information it is said that China and not Chili is causing the trouble. Secretary Tracy indicated very strongly that there was nothing in Chili requiring the navy, while it is generally understood that the Chinese situation is quite grave, and American interests there may require a few men-of-war.

RUMORS ABOUT CHILI.

A Consultation Presumably Upon Matters Relating to Chili.

WASHINGTON, Sept. 29.—For two hours to-day the president was in consultation with the representatives of the state and navy departments.

It is conjectured that the matters under consideration were statements from Minister Egan and Capt. Schley of recent occurrences in Chili, which are also conjectured to accord with the dispatch from Valparaiso printed in the New York Herald this morning. This dispatch stated that three United States citizens had been arbitrarily arrested in Santiago by order of the junta; that a cordon of police had been posted around the United States legation building; that access to the legation had been controlled by the junta, and finally, that the United States minister to Chili was being harassed and annoyed in his efforts to care for American interests.

Just what Capt. Schley had to communicate to the navy department cannot be learned from any of the officials, but it is surmised that it relates to the treatment of refugees, or that the bitter anti-American sentiment in Chili, resulting from the seizure of the Itata, has revealed itself in hostile or unfriendly demonstrations toward the officers and men of the Baltimore. However this may be, it is certain that the officials of the state and navy departments are not at all alarmed at the situation, and if the conference was called to devise means of meeting any emergency it is apparent that the persons who participated are satisfied that this has been done.

Secretary Tracy, while declining to make any statement relative to the conference, said that he did not intend to send any more ships to Chili and that he did not regard the situation as threatening.

In New York, to-day, Chilian agents positively denied the statements contained in the dispatch to the Herald.

Dr. Montt, the representative of the Chilian government here, to-day received a dispatch from his government. There was no allusion to the reported arrest of Americans in Santiago, or of any action intended to harass Minister Egan. Dr. Montt, without knowing whether any Americans have been arrested, discredits any and all reports that his government has or will treat men of any nationality harshly.

MORE PACIFIC.

Chancellor Von Caprivi Declares That European Powers Desire Peace.

BERLIN, Sept. 28.—Upon the occasion of the jubilee of the Seventy-eighth infantry regiment at Osnaburg, Hanover, Chancellor von Caprivi made a long optimistic speech upon the political situation in Europe.

He said that the apprehension, in some quarters, as to whether the existing state of things would be maintained was not warranted. Not one of the sovereigns, he added, wished to disturb the peace or to provoke a European war. Even the rapprochement between states which had recently occurred, did not afford ground for alarm. They were merely the expression of already exisiting circumstances. Perhaps they were nothing more than the establishment of a European equilibrium, as it formerly existed. No European government, the chancellor continued, desired war, which in its sufferings and consequences would probably be more terrible than all previous wars.

At the commers, given later in the day, to the officers of the Seventy-eighth regiment, Chancellor von Caprivi said that all the emperor's efforts would be directed towards the welfare of the country and the maintenance of peace.

The speeches of M. Ribot and Chancellor von Caprivi have produced an excellent impression here, allaying the feeling of uncertainty as regards the political outlook.

CAUSED A STIR.

South American Circles Excited Over the Chilian News From America.

LONDON, Sept. 29.—There was considerable stir to-day in South American circles over the news from Chili by way of New York, that the Junta was taking a hostile course toward Americans. Chilian stocks were but slightly affected, as the reports did not seem to be sufficiently definite.

If the rumors are confirmed to-morrow, and also the report that the Washington government has ordered war vessels to Chili, all Chilian interests are sure to be seriously and unfavorably influenced, as there is no confidence here in the ability of Chili to hold out for any length of time against the overwhelming resources of the United States, even although the Chilians might be superior at sea at first.

A Pointer for Americans.

ROME, Sept. 29.—The executive committee of the Italian-American exhibition at Genoa, in honor of the discovery of America by Columbus, have finally arranged for the erection of the buildings, which will cost 500,000 lire. It is the design of the committee that the exhibition shall consist of samples of the agricultural and industrial products of Italy and America with the object of showing the kinds of goods that can be most advantageously imported and exported. It is expected thus to give a new impulse to trans-Atlantic commerce. This would be a good opportunity for American merchants to introduce their goods into a new market.

Methodists to Meet in Red Wing.

RED WING, Minn., Special, Sept. 29.—The annual meeting of the Minnesota M. E. conference will convene here on Wednesday at 9 a. m., Bishop Merrill presiding. An attendance of at least 300 is expected.

WANTS A SEPARATION.

The Wife of the Belgian Minister to France Files Papers for a Divorce.

SIOUX FALLS, S. D., Sept. 29.—Baroness Destures, wife of the Belgian minister in Paris, to-day filed papers in a suit for a divorce against her husband. The papers were served on the baron Saturday, and he has cabled instructions to an attorney to make an appearance and defense.

The complainant recites that the baron and baroness were married in New York in May, 1875, and that ever since their marriage the baron has pursued a course of extreme cruelty toward the plaintiff. While in Paris she says that the baron applied foul epithets and accused his wife of not being chaste; that on June 14, 1890, defendant, by fraud and misrepresentation, attempted to procure her incarceration in an institution for the confinement of insane persons. This last fact will be decided on the trial.

It is maintained that the baron was anxious to secure control of his wife's estate, the annual income of which is estimated at $80,000, and to do this it was necessary to prove she was insane. To escape the evil scheme of her husband the baroness left the home of her husband in Paris at midnight and took the train for Germany. Then she came to America, where she was advised by relatives to secure a separation.

Before her marriage the baroness was a Miss Carey, a niece of John Jacob Astor, and her marriage was a society sensation in New York.

MITIGATED THE SENTENCE.

President Harrison Lets Col. Compton Down a Little Easier.

WASHINGTON, Sept. 29.—The president has passed upon the record of the court martial in the case of Col. Charles E. Compton, Fourth cavalry.

While Col. Compton was in command of the military post at Walla Walla, Wash., some of his soldiers attacked the jail and lynched a gambler named Hunt, under arrest for killing a soldier. It was charged that Col. Compton failed to take steps to prevent the lynching, though requested to do so, and he was court-martialed on a charge of negligence. The court found him guilty and sentenced him to suspension from rank and command for three years on half-pay, and to be confined to the limits of the military post.

The president has approved the proceedings of the court, but has mitigated the sentence to suspension from rank and command on half-pay for two years.

A Mob Hangs a Woman.

HOLLENDALE, Miss., Sept. 29.—Saturday night a quadroon woman named Lou Stevenson called Mr. Davis, a white bartender, from the saloon, and while she engaged him in conversation a negro named Grant White appeared upon the scene and shot Davis without provocation, killing him instantly.

The negro escaped but was captured at Wayside and was brought back. The infuriated populace hanged both White and his accomplice, the negro woman, to a railroad bridge near the town early this morning. There is great excitement here, but no further trouble is expected.

No Vacations Allowed.

WASHINGTON, Special Telegram, Sept. 29.—Otis Staples, chief Chippewa pine examiner, has written to Commissioner Carter asking that Stillwater be designated as the headquarters of the corps of pine examiners. Commissioner Carter has replied by saying that no headquarters will be established, but the examiners are requested to name a postoffice nearest the pine to be examined, where they may be addressed. They are also informed that they are to go to the pine lands and begin their work and continue until it is complete, the expectation being that they are to remain in the woods until the examination is finished.

Cabinet Reconstruction.

OTTAWA, Ont., Sept. 29.—Parliament will be prorogued next Wednesday. It is learned on excellent authority that the reconstruction of the cabinet will take place almost immediately. Peter White, the present speaker of the house, will succeed Frank Smith as superintendent of public works and will be succeeded by J. Wood of Brockville. Senator Carling, minister of agriculture, will be succeeded by Hugh John Macdonald of Winnipeg. Other changes will probably be made, including the retirement of Caron, minister of militia, who will be succeeded by G. A. Kirkpatrick of Kingston.

Gathering for a Convention.

ABERDEEN, S. D., Special Telegram, Sept. 29.—The town is swarming with delegates and visitors for to-morrow's Republican convention, but it is too early to speak conclusively of the probable results. Among the notables already on the ground are Judge Bennett of Clark, Candidate Melville of Huron, Congressman Pickler of Faulkton, Register Bailey of Pierre, Marshal Fry of Vermillion, Secretary of State Ringsrud of Elk Point and Hon. L. B. French of Yankton. The latter has opened his headquarters and proposes making a vigorous canvass for the nomination, with many elements in his favor.

Frightful Work of a Prisoner.

MARSEILLES, Sept. 29.—A violent prisoner escaped from the hands of the police to-day by making an unexpected attack upon his captors with a carving knife. Before he could be recaptured he had been chased through the town and had killed one policeman and cut himself so severely with a sword that he died. Besides, three policemen were dangerously wounded.

Caused a Sensation.

LONDON, Sept. 29.—Signor Crispi's recent speech at Palermo has caused a sensation throughout Europe, as it virtually proclaims an Anglo-Italian alliance as a fait accompli. Ministerial organs in Rome ask what impression the speech will make in England, the government of which country has repeatedly denied the existence of an Anglo-Italian alliance.

Omaha Is at Work.

DENVER, Sept. 29.—C. R. Scott of Omaha was in the city to-day. He will attend the Republican state convention at Glenwood Springs to-morrow, and ask the convention to recommend Omaha as the place for holding the national Republican convention in 1892. He bears letters from Senators Walcott, Teller, Hon. John M. Thurston and others asking the convention to adopt a resolution to that effect.

Mills Receives an Ovation.

ZANESVILLE, Ohio, Sept. 29.—Hon. Roger Q. Mills received an ovation here to-day. Fully 5,000 people were in the audience and more than that number were turned away unable to gain admittance. He confined his remarks to the tariff and made no mention of silver coinage.

Gorman In the Race.

WHEELING, W. Va., Sept. 29.—Col. John A. Robinson, an influential politician of this state and an intimate friend of Senator Gorman, says that Gorman will be in the race of the Democratic nomination for president next year, and that the West Virginia delegation will be solid for him.

A Great Blow-Out.

NORWALK, Ohio, Sept. 29.—Gov. Campbell and Judge Stilwell spoke to an immense crowd here to-day. It was one of the largest outpourings of people Huron county has seen since the big Blaine meeting in 1884, and many people think it exceeded even that.

THE FARMER'S COLUMN.

MATTERS OF INTEREST AND INSTRUCTION TO THE FARMER.

Stables for Horses--The "Belted" Dutch Cattle--Raising Cream--Adulterated Butter--An Imaginary Horse--Feed for Poultry.

Stables for Horses.

For common farm horses ordinarily good stables will suffice, though it is well to remember that even common farm horses are the better for having comfortable, well-ventilated quarters to sleep in. It does not promote their health or longevity to spend their nights and Sundays in close filthy stables, dark, and reeking with fumes from accumulations of rotting manure and saturated bedding. Horses are valuable property, and should be treated with such care that they will last to a good old equine age, sound in wind and limb. Yet many farmers, blind to their own interests, give the stabling of these useful animals no more thought than if their lives and health were of no account whatever. Any sort of a place will do, they think, and the horses are placed in quarters that seriously diminish their power to work, and even shorten their lives. As some one, has well said, the fumes of a horse stable kept in a condition that is quite too common, will rot the harness and take the luster off the carriage, and surely in such an atmosphere a horse's lungs and eyes cannot fail to suffer. As a matter of fact, we know they do suffer from this cause, and no doubt many diseases to which horses are liable have their origin in the unwholesome condition of the stable.

A well-planned horse stable will include, first of all, a sufficient supply of light. A small window directly in front of the horse, if he faces an outside wall, will add a great deal to his comfort, and save a severe strain upon the vision when he is taken outdoors. The light should not, however, be too bright. If it faces in any direction but the north it should be made partially opaque by a coat of limewash or any other convenient means. A still better arrangement is to provide box stalls and place the window so that the horse can look out of it and see what is going on in the neighborhood.

The constancy with which a horse will avail himself of such an opportunity, and the keen interest he seems to take in affairs about him, are proof enough, if proof be needed, of the value of such an arrangement.

The stable should also be well ventilated. This does not mean that it should be cold or draughty. Even common, hard-worked horses are sensitive animals, taking cold easily and becoming stiff in the joints. They should never be exposed to a cold draught of air, especially when warm. Heedlessness in this respect has ruined many a valuable animal. But pure air, indirectly introduced in both summer and winter, is as important as good feed.

A manger for hay is much better than a high rack. It should be about a foot and a half wide at the top, sloping to a foot at the bottom, and three feet deep, raised a foot from the floor. The grain box, by the side of the manger, should be 12 inches deep and 16 inches square at the top, with one side sloping to correspond with the manger.

A good floor for the horse stable is made of concrete mixed with gas tar, and rammed down hard. It is easy to keep such a floor clean, and it does not become foul like planking by saturation with urine. Many, however, prefer a wooden floor, and this may be provided by placing over the concrete a floor of wooden bars laid lengthwise and an inch apart. But a good bed of German moss on any floor will keep the stable sweet and the horse's feet in good condition. When this is not attainable sawdust may be used or a good bed of straw, which, however, should not be allowed to become foul by long use.

Such conveniences as shutes to convey the hay and grain from above to manger and feed box are easily constructed and save a great deal of labor in feeding.

The "Belted" Dutch Cattle.

These curiously marked cattle are somewhat similar in general characteristics to the more wide known Holstein Frisians, but are not so large, averaging in weight about one thousand pounds. Their distinguished mark is a broad belt or "blanket" of white around the body, while the front and hind quarters are solid black. A herd of these animals present a singular appearance, looking as though the owner had carefully fastened a white cloth around each one.

But this is not the sole characteristic of the breed, for they are asserted to be extraordinary milkers, yielding, under favorable conditions, an average of 10,000 pounds of milk a year. This capacity for milk production places the Belted cattle in the front rank as a dairy breed, and there can be no doubt that, as they become more generally known, they will grow rapidly in popular esteem. At present they are chiefly confined in this country to small herds in the eastern and middle States, but a vigorous effort is being made to introduce them to more general notice, and at the same time to maintain the standard in color, shape, size and milking capacity. It is asserted by those who have had the opportunity of judging, that the Belted cows are peculiarly well suited, by their small size, gentleness of disposition and great milk yield, as well as by their striking appearance, to meet the requirements alike of the dairy and the family.

Adulterated Butter.

According to Mr. Otto Hehner, President of the Society of Publi; Analysis, foreign butter is still adulterated with margarine to a very considerable extent. Out of 148 samples of so-called butter sent to him to be analyzed, during twelve months, 86 were found to have been adulterated with margarine to an extent varying from 6 to 85 per cent. This must not be taken to represent the average condition of imported butter, as the samples were sent because they were regarded as suspicious; but the fact that so large a number of adulterations have been detected among samples submitted by the members of one association indicates fraud on an extensive scale. Unfortunately, as Mr. Hehner points out, the improvement in the manufacture of margarine has been so great that mixtures containing from 20 to 30 per cent. of it cannot easily be detected by the best judges without analysis. Moreover, he has reason to believe that shippers regularly employ chemists to advise them as to the kind and percentage of adulteration which may with some degree of safety be practiced, and for this reason he apprehends that mixing will become more and more common, unless analysis to detect fraud is more frequently resorted to as a preventive. The truth seems to be that the Margarine act requires to be extended in the direction of appointing officers to take samples occasionally from the consignments of shippers, and to have them analyzed.—The Dairyman, England.

Raising Cream.

In a series of tests made at the Cornell station to determine the relative value of different methods in raising cream, the following results were obtained.

In eleven trials of milk set in the Cooley creamer with ice water, at 44 deg., the average per cent of fat in the skim milk was 24.

In eleven trials of milk diluted with an equal weight of cold water and set in open air, the average per cent of fat in the skim milk was 1.28.

In six trials where milk was diluted with 20 and 50 per cent of cold water, the average per cent of fat in the skim milk was 1.11.

In two trials was set in deep cans without dilution, in running water, at 60 degrees, the average per cent of fat in the skim milk was .89.

In two trials of milk set in shallow pans, at 64 degrees, the average per cent of fat in the skim milk was .48.

In a trial where milk was set in shallow pans and one third of its weight of water at 120 degrees added, the per cent of fat in the skim milk was .75.

These tests were made by H. H. Wing and C. D. Smith.

An Imaginary Horse.

The general purpose horse is sought for by many, yet obtained by none, says an exchange. Strictly speaking a general purpose horse is one that can do everything that a horse is called on to do. It is impossible in the nature of things for a horse to be so constructed that he can do everything. A horse to be a general purpose horse could combine all the qualities of a runner, a trotter, a pacer, a roadster, a coacher, a saddler, a hunter and a draft horse, also a lady's driving horse and children's pony. The greatest value in a horse comes from his possessing some particular quality, or combination of qualities in the same line, and the ability to do one thing and do it well. The better adapted a horse is to do one thing, the more valuable he is.

Feed for Poultry.

Where cows are kept of course sour milk can be provided for the growing chicks; they are fond of it, and they improve on it wonderfully. For solid food, even now, give them wheat and scalded oats. Potatoes are plentiful; boil the small ones and work them up with the ground feed, which should be given in the morning; wheat and oats and a little corn at night. This system of feeding is good for the old as well as the young. Your good judgment will tell you what else to feed by way of variety.

For Smutty Seed.

It is important to sow clean seed. If one has smutty wheat his seed should be treated to a solution of blue vitriol, or strong brine or copperas water. If the seed wheat is poured into a tub of the solution the smutty wheat will raise. The heavy wheat should be spread out to dry, or can be dried with plaster before sowing. It is so easily held in check that one need never have it twice in succession if care is taken to sow only clean seed Rotation is advantageous too; that is, it is safest not to sow a field twice

Fruit Growing.

Experience in California and other of the newer settlements in other parts of the Union of late years established fruit-growing as a most profitable industry, so that there is now no danger that it will be neglected in the future. There is nothing the settler at the South or West can better do so soon as his newly purchased piece of land is cleared and prepared, than to plant liberally of apples, pears, cherries, quinces, grapes and small fruits.

Cleanliness in the Dairy.

In butter-making cleanliness must be the watchword always, especially in the home dairy. The entire process is composed of one little detail after another, and the person who has not the inclination nor the faculty to observe perfect care in each of these minute operations can hardly expect to turn out a produce that will command an outside price.

BOWSER AS HE GETS UP.

His Temper Is Particularly Bad Early in the Morning.

Mr. Bowser isn't the least bit particular about his shirts and collars and such things—no husband ever is. Every morning as regular as clockwork, when 7:30 o'clock comes, Mrs. Bowser, who has been up for half an hour, looks in to find him on the broad of his back, with his hands locked under his neck and the bedclothes wrapped around him like some giant mummy.

"Mr. Bowser!"

No answer.

"Mr. Bowser!'

"Um!"

"Mr. Bowser, do you know what time it is?"

"U-m-m-m!"

"Come breakfast will be ready before you are. You wanted to get away a little earlier this morning."

"Whaz mazher?"

"Come—wake right up!"

"Lemme 'lone!"

"Mr, Bowser."

He opens his eyes, turns over with a grunt and a growl, and ten minutes after she has gone downstairs he carefully sits up in bed. He is all there.

Then he kicks the clothes down with his right leg—then with his left—knocks his pillow off on the floor, and "sorter" falls out after it with a growl like some old sore-backed bear trying to crawl through a rail fence. Ten minutes later Mrs. Bowser feels the house shake and hears a voice calling:

"Mrs. Bowser, are you alive or dead!"

"What is it dear."

"Don't 'what-is-it dear' me! Is this a dime museum, cider-mill or the home of a hard-working respectable man?"

"What is it she asks as she arrives on the scene of the fatal disaster.

"Look—a—there, Mrs. Bowser—look—a—there!"! he hoarsely whispers as he holds out a pair of suspenders in his hand.

"Yes—I see. You broke 'em about a month ago and mended 'em with a piece of string. They've busted again. Go ahead and get on your collar and I'll fix'em. There they are, and you had better buy a new pair to-day."

"Some mighty queer things around this house!" he mutters, as he buttons them on. "Them suspenders was all right when I went to bed last night. Next time you want to play circus take a piece of clothes line. Where is my front collar button?"

"You must have flirted it out when you drew on your shirt. Here it is "

"After this when you go prowling around at night I wish you'd leave my things alone! If you want collar buttons just say so, and I'll buy you a cartload!"

"Here's your collar, dear."

It is beautifully clean and white, but he looks at it and growls. It is one of a dozen he had made to order, and fits him to perfection, but it is no sooner buttoned than he gives it a hitch and a hunch and a yank, and roars out:

"By the great horn spoon! but can I never get a collar to fit me! Its bad enough to have to wear an old bag of a shirt, let alone having my throat cut with such collars!"

"But they were made to measure, you know."

"Measure! Measure! Do you suppose there's a shirt-maker on earth who knows enough to measure a man's neck? The confounded cross-eyed idiot probably thought I wanted to button 'em onto my ears!"

Mrs. Bowser applies the soothing syrup, and the third collar is allowed to remain. He growls over his necktie, but gets it on after awhile, and is then ready to inquire:

"I suppose the girl in the kitchen is using my toothbrush for a poker, isn't she? I'd just like the public to know how this house is run! It's no wonder that so many husbands walk off and are never heard of again!"

"There's your toothbrush right in front of your nose!" replies Mrs. Bowser.

"Oh! it is! Mighty funny how it got there all at once! Hairbrush isn't down in the coalbin is it?"

"It's right there in plain sight. No one ever disturbs your things, Mr. Bowser."

"They don't, eh! Didn't nobody get up in the night and throw my shoes out into the yard, I suppose?"

"Of course not!"

"Then where are they? I took them off right here, but they are gone! Such a system of housekeeping! People wonder that strong men become insane, but there is a cause for it, Mrs. Bowser—a cause for it. I sometimes—"

"You took your shoes off downstairs last night. Your feet ached and you sat in your stocking feet."

"And those shoes were not deliberately picked up this morning and carried down stairs?"

"Of course not. Are you ready?"

"I suppose so. If not, I'll have to go as I am. I can't expect any one to care whether I have any comfort or not. No wonder I'm taken for a man 75 years old!"

Three times a week after Mr. Bowser is in bed, Mrs. Bowser removes the buttons from his shirt, places them in a clean one hangs the shirt over the back of a chair. The other one is taken away to the hamper in the clothes press, and she remarks:

"You'll find your clean shirt right here when you get up."

"Yes."

Morning comes and Mr. Bowser gets out of bed. He feels around with his feet; no shirt. He paws around under the bed; no shirt.

"Now, why on earth did that woman go and take my shirt down stairs?" he growls, and he gets up and goes hunting.

By and by he finds the clothes press; then he finds the hamper; then he fishes up the shirt and continues:

"It's either got to stop, or I leave! Talk about system! Why, that woman knows no more about housekeeping than a bootjack! There it is again—not one single button in my shirt! Mrs. Bowser! Hello! down there!"

"Yes—yes! What's the matter, Mr. Bowser?"

"Matter! Matter!" he hoarsely whispers, as she arrives at the top of the stairs—"look at me—at this shirt!"

"Mr. Bowser, do you see that clean shirt on that chair?" she sternly asks, "Didn't I fix it last night? Isn't every button in place? You are the queerest man I ever heard of!"

"I am, eh! Queer because I want shirt buttons in my shirt. Queer because I can't have patience with your lack of system. Queer because I put up with a million times more than any other husband in New York. Mrs. Bowser, if you had some men to live with you'd find out what was what! Perhaps I can stand it three or four weeks longer, but!"—

But she is gone, and he takes it out in kicking over a chair and knocking everything off the bureau before he is finally dressed and ready to go down to breakfast and inquire why in the name of common sense his knife and fork were put on the left-hand side of his plate instead of the right.—M Quad in New York World.

HE WAS TOO SUDDEN.

He Exposed a Robbery That Didn't Materialize and Was Reviled.

Two men sat together in a Franklin street car coming to town recently, says the Boston News. There was another man behind them, listening to their conversation, which seemed to interest him.

"Whatcher got in the bag? one of the men asked his companion.

"Oh, my tools, I've got a job to do at the—th National this afternoon."

"Safe."

"Yes, a big one. Guess it'll be a hard job to open it, but I'm pretty good at the biz, and ought to make a nice haul."

"Sure. Gimme a light off o'that cigar."

The man behind had been growing excited, and at this point sprang from the car, dodged a blockade of drays, and jumped into a herdic, yelling to driver to carry him to the—th National bank. When he got there every one was gone but the watchman, who sat unconcernedly in the doorway reading.

"Hi, there! Wake up! Get your revolver ready!" shouted the man, rushing up the steps.

"Eh? What's the——"

"Matter? You're going to be robbed in a minute. There's a man coming up on the car now with a full kit of burglar's tools to crack your safe. For heaven's sakes, man, wake up!"

The watchman jumped for his revolver and was examining it when the man shouted:

"Hurry! He is coming up the steps!'

The watchman cocked his revolver, gritted his teeth, and looked. The man with the bag of tools came up the steps slowly.

"Shoot!" yelled the man who had discovered the plot.

"Hey?" asked the man with the tools. "Shoot what?"

Hello, Jimmie," said the watchman.

Hello! Got her stuck again?"

"Yes, couldn't open the safe at all this noon. Get ter work quick, so's I kin go home."

"An't you going to shoot him?" yelled the man who had exposed the burglar,

"Shoot him!" said the watchman. "Shoot him! Why, he's going ter open the safe for the bank people. It's stuck, sure. Come get out!"

The last seen of the man he was trying to stave the herdic driver who had carried him to the bank off for a quarter.

TALE OF A SILK HAT.

Sad Result of Its Being Shot With a Garden Hose.

"When I was a gilded youth in Rochester, N. Y.," says a prominent Detroiter to a Detroit Tribune man, "my young life was blighted through the deadly influence of a silk hat, and I have been prejudiced against them ever since."

"How did it happen?"

"Well, I was engaged to a young lady there, and one day I hired the fastest team in town, dressed in my best suit, got under a new tile, and started to take her riding. Just before I reached her house a big colored gardener who was sprinkling a lawn let go at that hat. He made a good shot, too. The hat went over my eyes, the horses started to run, and I shot passed the house in a sad state of dishabile and dampness. It took me ten minutes to pull up the horses and readjust myself. Then I had to go home and change my hat and clothes.

"Meanwhile there were terrible scenes at the house of my adored. Both herself and her mother had seen me pass the house, and jumped at the conclusion that I was intoxicated. The poor girl flew to her room and went into hysterics, while the old lady put her tongue in training to blister me when I should put in an appearance."

"Well, didn't you explain?"

"Explain? I never got a chance. When I got back an hour later my prospective mother-in-law came to the door and answered my inquiry with:

"Miss B. has gone driving with a friend. She doesn't care to see you. You went past here an hour ago in a state of beastly intoxication."

"With that she slammed the door in my face and the romance was ended."

Nice russet or black reins. The breast-collar, neck-strap, breeching and girt folds are made either of patent enamel or plain harness breeching leather as preferred and the layers on the same are cut wide and straight, and being stitched so very fine and nicely creased, give to the harness a costly custom-made appearance. The hip and back straps are doubled and stitched, nicely creased and finished throughout. Boxloops of beautiful design as on custom-made work. Trimmings either Davis Rubber, Nickel Wire or Brass Wire, or a Fancy style. We refer you to the publishers of this paper as to our responsibility. Remit by Express or Money Order. Money refunded if goods are not satisfactory.

YOU WANT

a San Francisco paper and of course you want a good one. The WEEKLY EXAMINER fills the want completely, for it is the best. It gives you every week not only all the news, but the best literary and miscellaneous matter published on the American continent—that is its specialty; being the best. It wants your subscription—yours particularly—and offers not only to you, but to every other subscriber, one or more attractive premiums.

In the first place, it gives every subscriber, one of the four magnificent etchings or paintings described below, and delivers it safely at his address, postage paid.

"The Retreat from Moscow," by Meissonier,
"The Roman Chariot Race," by A. Wagner.

Each of these pictures is 21x28 inches, and they are elegantly reproduced in fac simile, showing every tint and color of the great originals, either one of which could not be purchased for $100,000.

"Women and Children First," by C. Napier, Hemy,
"Christ Leaving the Prætorium," by Gustave Doré.

Each of these pictures is reproduced in photogravure, size 21x28, and eminently fitted for framing, and will adorn the walls of the most refined house.

Each subscriber has the choice of any one of these four pictures, which will be mailed him in a tube direct from the EXAMINER office, as soon as the subscription is received.

In the second place, it will give 5,000 premiums, valued in the aggregate at about $125,000 to its subscribers this year. If there are 50,000 subscribers, one in ten will get one of these premiums; if there are 100,000, only one in twenty. But no matter how many there are, each and every one of these premiums—which range in value from 50 cents to $6,000—will be given absolutely without cost to some of those who have paid $1.50 for the WEEKLY EXAMINER for one year. The EXAMINER is thoroughly responsible, as you know, or as Wells, Fargo & Co. or any bank or commercial agency in San Francisco will assure you, and the leading men of the city will see that its premiums are distributed exactly as agreed and that every subscriber no matter where he is located, will receive just what is assigned to him.

Of course you want your home paper also, and you can just as well as not save a little money by taking the EXAMINER with it. The price of the WEEKLY EXAMINER is $1.50 per year, including the premium picture and your share of the $125,000 list of premiums, which are fully described in the twelve page Premium Supplement, which will be sent free on application to Murder at East Grand Forks.

When Frank J. Mead wrote his scathing article on East Grand Forks it was replied to in the Grand Forks Herald by Robert Woods, justice of the peace in East Grand Forks, who stated the city was as law abiding as any in the country. This morning about 3 o'clock Woods was lying unconscious on the sidewalk in East Grand Forks. His revolver, from which no shot had been fired, was lying beside him. He had been shot through the eye. He never rallied and died at 10 o'clock. Woods had been watching beside the bedside of a sick friend. It is supposed he surprised a burglar in the rear of a saloon near by as a panel had been cut out, and there are signs of a struggle. There is absolutely no clue to the murderer. Robert Woods was over to the county division convention last winter with the large delegation from East Grand Forks and made an address. His untimely death in this tragic manner sends a thrill of horror through the people; and it looks almost as if Mead's prophecies in regard to East Grand Forks were being fulfilled.

To Dance Before the Queen.

FOUR PRETTY AMERICANS TO ENTERTAIN HER MAJESTY WITH A MINUET.

NEW YORK, Oct. 5.—Fashionable circles are much exorcised as to the identity of four pretty American girls who have arrived in London to dance a minuet before the Queen. Their chaperon refuses to give their names but says they are well known in the best New York society. A picture, however, is printed in October number of the New York and Paris Young Ladies' Fashion Bazar entitled "Pretty girls learning to dance the minuet," which gives some clue to their identity. Society here is also interested in the fact that each of the four Americans is to wear a dress similar to the one illustrated and marked No. 8 in the colored plates of the magazine which has partly revealed their personality and set fashionable circles agog. The young ladies had been practicing the minuet for eight months before asking the privilege, which has been granted, of dancing before Her Majesty. The New York and Paris Young Ladies Fashion Bazar is for sale by all newsdealers, and will also be sent, postage prepaid, for 25 cents per single copy. The subscription price is $3 per year. Address George Munro, 17 to 27 Vandewater street, New York.

A Pure Baking Powder.

A baking power that can be depended upon to be free from lime and alum is a desideratum in these days of adulteraeded food. So far as can be jugded from the official report, the "Royal" seems to be the only one yet found by chemical analyses to be entirely without one or the other of these substances, and absolutely pure. This, it is shown, results from the exclusive use by its manufacturers of cream of tartar specially refined and prepared by patent process which totally remove the tartrate of lime and other impurities. The costs of this chemically pure craam of tartar ismuch geater than any other, and it is used in nobaking powder except the "Royal," the manufacturers of which control the patents under which it is refined.

Dr. Edward G. Love, formeryy analytical chemist for the U. S. Goernment, who made the analyses for the New York State Board of Health in their investigation the ingredients of allthose sold,it this market enables him to speak authoritatively, says of the purity, wholesomeness, and superior luality of the "Royal:"

"I find the Royal Baking Powder composed of pure and wholesome ingredients. It is a cream of tartar powder and does not contain either alum or phosphates, or other injourious substance."

Prof. Love's tests, and the recent official tests by both the Tnited States and C nadian Governments, show the Royal Baking Powder to be superior to all others in strenfth and leavening power. It is not only the most economical in use, but makes the purest, finest flavored and most wholesome food.

A Sad Mistake.

Is to have a stable of fine horses and have the distemper start among them with nothing to prevent its spreading. Heed the warning, and check it in the first stages of the disease by using Metzger's Pink Eye and Distemper Cure, as it has never been known to fail. Cures horses of old chronic coughs, colds, chills, epizootic, and all throat, lung Bronchial and nasal troubles. Especially good in hay fever or heaves. Price $1 per bottle or 6 for $5. For sale by W. A. Schreiter.

Twenty Years.

To the citizen of the Old World who is observant on his tavels in the United States, this is a country where development is marvelously rapid. In Europe, a family, a town, or a city which cannot trace its history back more than two hundered and fifty years is as hard to be found as a black swan. Old towns have grown, but new ones have not been founded. Sixty million more of people are here than a hundered and fifty years ago. But if the development of a hundred or two hundred years seems wonderful to the European what shall we say of the material progress of the last twen years? A single illustration is enough. Twenty years ago this week, Chicago suffered an unparalleled loss by fire. The business district was destroyed and thousands of people left shelterless in the streets. What is Chicago now? The second city of the United States. What were the states west of the Mississippi twenty years ago? What they are now can best be ascertained by taking a trip over the Burlington system of roads, which reaches all important places in ten Western and Northern States. For informaion write to W. J. C. Kenyon, St. Paul. Minn.

A Very Narrow Escape.

Yes, I had a very narrow escape, said a prominent citizen to a friend. I was confined to my bed for more than two years and all my friends gave me up. I had running sores on my limbs and after using nearly everything was induced to try Metzger s Pain Eradicator and now here I am, sound and hearty. You will find it for sale by W. A. Schreiter. Price 50c a bottle, trial size free.

A Remarkable Good Man.

He who attends to the comfort of his family and will not suffer himself or allow them to, with that most dreadful of pains, rheumatism. Metzger's Angle and Wormwood oil Liniment is a positive cure for rheumatism and sprains. It is the best external application on earth. One bottle is better than any amount of porous plaster. Price 50 cents per bottle. For sale by W. A. Schreiter.

Things a Woman Can Do.

Of the modern daughter og Eve a Boston paper says.

She can come to a conclusion without the slightest trouble of reasoning on it and no sane man can do that.

Six of them can talk at once and get along first rate, and no two men can do that.

She can stick fifty pins in her dress whilehe is getting one under his thumb nail.

She is as cool as a cucumber in a half dozen tight dresses and skirts, while a man will sweat and fume and growl in one loose shirt.

She can talk as sweat as peach and cream to the woman she hates, while two men would pound each other's heads before they had exchanged ten words.

She can throw a stone with a curve that would be a fortune to a base ball pitcher.

She can say "No" in such a low voice that it means "Yes."

She can appreciate a kiss from her husband seventy-five years after the marriage cermony was performed.

She can walk half a night with a colicky baby in her arms without once expressing the desire of murdering the infant.

She can do more in a minute than a man can do in an hour, and do it better.

She can drive a man crazy in twenty-four hours and then bring him to paradise in two seconds by simply tickling him under the chin, and there does not live that mortal son of Adam's misery who can do it.

Not Much of a War.

More than one of our contemporaries have alluded facetiously to the "baking powder war." There is no war of the character indicated. A certain baking powder achieved fame because it was better than anything that had previonsly been prepared and because it was advertised in a liberal, original and judicious manner. The success of this powder led to imitate, as success always does but to assert or to intimate that there is war between the Royal Baking Powder and its more or less feeble imitators suggests the picture of a death grapple between an eagle and a house-fly.

Merit Wins.

We desire to say to our citizens, that for years we have been selling Dr. King's New Discovery for Consumption, Dr. King's New Life Pills, Bucklen's Arnica Salve and Electic Bitters, and have never handled remedies that sell as well, or that have given such universal satisfaction. We do not hesitate to guarantee them every time, and we stand ready to refund the purchase price, if satisfaction results do not follow their use. These remedies have won their great power popularity purely on their merits W. A. Schreiter's Druggist.

His Curiosity Was Gratified.

A stranger stood alone in the street of a great city. His hat was napless his boots covered with the dust of travel. Around him on every side a hurrying throng pushed and jostled in mad haste. He turned to a friendly policeman and said: "Say: Where be all these people gwine"! The officer was dumfounded at such ignorance Where are they going? Why, to purchase tickets via the popular Wiscontin Central If you are going anywhere you want to go with the crowd and ride on the best track in the most comfortable cars and with the greatest ease you ever experienced". THE experiment of stopping runaway horses by the use of electricity, without injury to the animals, has been successfully tried in Chicago.

A CHICAGO paper finds the difficulty about young women voting under the Australian act that they would require a chaperone on entering the booths. Those likely to vote would be too old to need this escort.

THE colored people of Georgia are prosperous and gradually acquiring wealth. They return 15 per cent. more of property this year than they did last. They have returned $14,196,735 worth of taxable property.

A FASHIONABLE young woman at New Brunswick, Ga., created a sensation by marrying the young man who was to have acted as best man at her wedding a few weeks ago. On the eve of the ceremony she jilted the groom because his breath smelt of whiskey.

ONE of the observances at a Servian marriage is compelling the bride to stand upon a table with bread, water, and wine in her hands as a sign that she is to have those articles in her care, and to hold a piece of sugar in her mouth, in token that she must speak little, and that little sweetly.

THINGS are coming to a bad pass for Jay Gould. When he acquires a railroad its securties at once become shaky, and no investor want anything to do with them. It has been discovered, after a much longer period than one would suppose it would require, that there is nothing in Gould stocks for anybody but Gould.

IN Racine, Wis., a coolness has risen between two worthy ministers, because one condemned the other in his cermon for going to a circus. One would think, however, that the breach might be easily healed. The minister who went to the circus might preach against the other minister for not going, and then they might agree to let the scores balance each other.

AMONG peculiar legacies may be chronicled that of the strangely constituted widow who left a sum of money to provide real champagne at theatrical performances in Paris, where the drinking of wine was a feature of the play. More recently a sum of money, amounting to $15,000, was given in trust to Mr. Irving to supply the same "properties" under similar circumstances, the donor in this case being the daughter of a well-known London physician.

AN official memorandum of the trip of the whale-shaped steam barge Wetmore across the Atlantic contains the following: "In steaming 384 hours from Montreal to Liverpool used 266 tons of coal; distance run, 3,032 knots. Had head sea 100 hours; beam sea, very high, 50 hours; aft, 50 hours; various the rest. Had very thick weather in channel. Carried 26 tons of coal on deck from Sydney to clear off banks; rough sea; lost no coal."

OUR beautiful White Squadron is having a delightful time visiting Atlantic ports in which its officers appear as welcome as though they were as plentifully endowed with wives as the redoubtable Jim Bludsoe. But just now there is need of several first-class American cruisers in Chinese waters. Of course it would be a hardship to Admiral Walker and his jolly tars to tear them away from their pleasant moorings and summer saunterings about the sounds and harbors of our east coast, but they are sadly needed to uphold our national dignity in the eyes of the moon-eyed children of China.

Washington's Farewell Address.

A vexed question has been raised concerning the authorship of this address. At present it appears that it was the joint production of Washington, Madison and Hamilton. Washington drew up a rough draft of it about the close of his first term, and requested Madison to revise and change it where he thought best. He did so; but it was not used then. Afterward, near the close of his second term, Washington placed it in the hands of Hamilton, and asked him to redress it. Thus it received the mental strain of three of our greatest Americans, yet it breathes the spirit and embodies the system of policy in which Washington had acted throughout his administration.

To quite an extent the counsels and recommendations of this farewell address have been adopted by our national management; and fortunate would it have been for America if all had been adopted and followed, especially that concerning characterizing parties by geographical divisions—Northern, Southern, Eastern and Western. The failure to adopt this has cost this generation alone thousands of most precious lives and millions of hard-earned wealth, besides endangering all our most precious rights and liberties.—Chautauquan.

TRIAL FOR HERESY.

A Report on the Case of Dr. Briggs Present ed to the New York Presbytery.

Lengthy and Specific Charges of Heresy, for Which He Must Stand Trial.

NEW YORK, Oct. 6.—Great interest was manifested to-day in the meeting of the New York presbytery in the Scotch Presbyterian church because the charge of heresy against Rev. Dr. Briggs was expected to come up.

The interest in it is not confined to the Presbyterian church, but has spread until the eyes of churchmen and laymen throughout the land are centered upon the proceedings at the little church in West Fourteenth street to-day.

The offense that Dr. Briggs is charged with has made him more prominent of late than any other Presbyterian in the land. For seventeen years he was the professor of Hebrew in the seminary, and has been a recognized authority on criticism in this country. It has long been known that his views were contrasted with those of Dr. Greer, of the Princeton seminary, and Dr. Patton, of the college of New Jersey, who represented the conservative element in the church, but he was never regarded a heretic. Last winter he delivered an inaugural address on the "Authority of Scripture," in which the Bible and the church and the reason were named as the sources of divine authority, and the barriers of the Bible, superstition, verbal inspiration, authenticity, inerrancy, violation of laws of nature and predilection were demolished. The address precipitated matters in the same way that the publication of Rev. Howard McQueary's book brought about the trial and subsequent change of denomination of that divine. The proceedings were to have begun at 11 a. m. in the main building but was held in the chapel in the rear. Here, after the devotional exercises, it was moved that the presbytery should remain until the recess and the motion was passed after some hot discussion. In consequence of this the morning session was held without the participation of a large body of the presbyters who sat waiting in the church.

Rev. Dr. John C. Bliss was chosen moderator. This was declared to be a victory for the anti-Briggs men, although there was no division. The Briggs men would have liked to have Rev. Dr. C. L. Thompson elected moderator.

After some preliminary business of minor importance had been disposed of the question of hearing the report of the committee of prosecution which was to present the indictment against Dr. Briggs came up. Immediately there was a turmoil. When Dr. Burch, the chairman of the committee, got up and prepared to read the report, Dr. Alexander, of the University Place Presbyterian church, also arose and said he had a resolution to offer before the reading of the report was begun. This was practically a motion to suspend business. Many of the presbyters feared that the resolution had a bearing upon the report which would do away with its effectiveness. There was much impatience to have it read, but Dr. Alexander was not to be put down.

A COMPROMISE WAS EFFECTED

by which Dr. Alexander consented to read his resolution after which the presbytery were to decide whether it was of sufficient importance and revelancy to delay the hearing of the report of the committee. The resolution Dr. Alexander proposed to offer was as follows:

> Whereas, the presbytery of New York, at its meeting May last, on account of utterances contained in inaugural address delivered Jan. 20, 1891, appointed a committee to formulate charges against the author of that address, Rev. Charles A. Briggs, D. D., and whereas, since that action was taken the accused has supplemented those utterances by responding to certain categorical questions. Therefore,
> Resolved, That this presbytery, without pronouncing on the efficiency of these later declarations to cover all the points concerning which the accused has been called in question, deems it expedient to arrest judicial proceedings, and hereby discharges the committee from further consideration of the case.

A dozen presbyters were straightway on their feet talking excitedly. A dozen different motions were made at once, and Dr. Alexander took his seat in a perfect turmoil, after moving to suspend the order of the day to let in his resolution. Dr. Briggs sat unmoved on a chair in the rear of the room.

Rev. Dr. Birch took the floor. He said that no friend of Dr. Briggs could afford to vote for the motion offered by Dr. Alexander with a view of disposing of the real question at issue in the manner proposed by him. Dr. Birch said that the report did not condemn Dr. Briggs. It simply reported charges against him, and it would be for the presbytery to pass judgment on him. Dr. Briggs, he said, was one of those members of the church who professed a learning which he dispensed from theological chairs in seminaries, but were too erudite to be preached by the ministers of the Gospel.

PEACE OF THE CHURCH MENACED.

Rev. Dr. C. L. Thompson was on his feet when Dr. Birch sat down and urged that far greater interests were at stake at this time than the outcome of the proposed trial of the New York presbytery. The new revision, for instance, of the confession of faith, which was now approaching a happy consummation, would be seriously endangered by prosecuting this matter at this time. An ecclesiastical trial now meant ecclesiastical trouble as wide as the latitude of the church. The peace of the church had not been so menaced since 1837 as it was at this minute. He made a strong appeal for liberty in the church and urged that the course suggested by Dr. Alexander be adopted. He concluded by quoting the remark of the late Dr. Henry J. Van Dyke, "If we cannot have liberty and orthodoxy both, let us have liberty."

By the time Dr. Thompson finished speaking the hour for recess had arrived and the question therefore went over, a vote not having been taken on Dr. Alexander's motion to suspend the order of the day. The members were much excited when the session adjourned, and the room was a hubbub of reverend gentlemen shouting at the tops of their voices and waving their hands frantically.

When the presbytery reconvened Dr. Alexander withdrew his previous motion to have the consideration of his resolution precede the hearing of the committee's indictment against Dr. Briggs. He said he would put it off until after the report had been read.

Bank Wreckers Bound Over.

KINGSTON, N. Y., Oct. 6.—Ostrander and Trumpbour, the bank wreckers, were arraigned before Recorder Hussey this morning and waived examination, and were bound over to await the action of the grand jury next week. Judge Furman at Troy to-day appointed Nicholas E. Brodhead of Kingston temporary receiver for the Ulster County Savings institution. An injunction restraining the creditors and depositors from bringing attachments against the bank's assets was also granted.

THE LATEST SENSATION.

The Connection of Prince Albert Victor's Name With an Unsavory Scandal.

LONDON, Oct. 6.—Considerable interest is being taken in the echoes of the inquest on Saturday last on the body of Lydia Miller, or Manton, to use her stage name, a chorus girl of the Gaiety theater, who recently committed suicide by drinking half a pint of carbolic acid.

At the inquiry on Saturday Lord Charles Montagu, brother of the duke of Manchester, testified to having been on very intimate terms with the deceased and to having been late in keeping an appointment to lunch with her on the day of her death. This failure to keep an appointment promptly is said to have greatly annoyed the chorus girl. Since the inquest mysterious allusions have been made in the newspapers to a certain high personage, understood to be Prince Albert Victor, eldest son of the prince of Wales, who also is said to have had intimate relations with the dead girl.

The coroner still refuses access to the depositions taken, and it is only stated that the members of the coroner's jury were called upon to sign a blank paper instead of the usual record of the proceedings.

The Star to-day, commenting upon the affair, says that the truth as to the mystery will never be known, and that it is obvious that another inquest has been hushed up without good cause. Continuing, the Star says:

> A nuber of honorable and highly estimable gentlemen hushed up the Tranby Croft affair for the sake of society, and the circumstances of this death are said to have been kept dark for the sake of society. But society does not mean Lord Charles Montagu—he is an amiable young aristocrat and the brother of a duke; but dukes are cheap in Coroner Troutbeck's district—his friends never suspected Lord Charles Montagu of great wealth. Moreover there never was much secret about stage door Jeunesse Doree. To be on good terms with a smart chorister is so much the correct thing that a young swell is more likely to flaunt than to disguise it, while being on Christian name terms with a lord would be swaggered about by the smart chorister.
> But no one suspected Lord Charles Montagu and Lydia Manton to be more than the merest acquaintances. There is one young man whose name is closely connected with hers, and it is the name of a young man whose position would authorize efforts to hush the matter up for the sake of "society." It was at his request or by his command that she left the Gaiety theater, so it was said on her authority at the time. A little house at Broadstairs could tell stories about Miss Manton. It was there that she passed the summer, and Broadstairs had at the same time a distinguished visitor, whose presence, if it had been generally known, would have given the place excellent advertisement. This may give some idea as to why people are calling Lord Charles Montagu chivalrous and self-sacrificing. He came forward at the inquest and assumed the role of "particular friend" in order to screen another.

The St. James Gazette, the Globe and other papers denounce the coroner's secrecy.

> When it was found that she wore a diamond bracelet as a mark of princely favor, it was quite certain that everything that money could do would be done to prevent publicity at the inquest. Was it because there was a crime to conceal? Or was it because some exalted personage was involved—some person whose feelings could not endure the penalty of exposure?

In an interview with George Lewis, Q. C., who watched the inquest upon the body of the dead Gaiety girl, that distinguished lawyer says:

> I know nothing of any attempt to suppress testimony. No motive for the girl's suicide has transpired, excepting that she was highly strung and subject to fits of depression. She had previously threatened to commit suicide. There was no suggestion at the inquest that Lord Charles Montague was not the real person involved. The girl's parents were very angry, and if there had been any one behind Lord Montague they would have elicited that fact.

Miss Lydia Miller, who was only twenty-three years of age, will be remembered by some people in the United States, as she visited America in 1888 with the Gaiety company of that year.

SARAH IN CHICAGO.

Bernhardt Losing No Opportunity of Appearing Before American Audiences.

CHICAGO, Oct. 6.—Madam Sarah Bernhardt and her company have arrived here and began an engagement in this city tonight. Since her arrival at San Francisco, en route from the antipodes, she has not only made the trip thus far, but has played every night. "A feat never before accomplished," said Manager Abbey. An interviewer says of her:

> She talked of her trip to Australia, and how she shot bears and other wild animals. Of the riots in Paris over the presentation of "Lohengrin" she said: "Oh, those rioters were not Parisians; they were French-Germans-Alsace-Lorrainers," she replied. "The Parisian likes everything that is grand." Of her newest success, "Pauline Blanchard," she says that it is extremely realistic, and that some times she felt afraid while personating Pauline that she would become crazy. As she talked she patted a roguish little opossum which she had brought with her from Australia. This and a monster St. Bernard dog are the only pets she has with her now, having discarded a bear and a kangaroo. In addition to her other work and her diversions she is writing a play.

FEARED THE POLICE.

Curtis' Gardener Voluntarily Retracts Damaging Evidence He Had Given.

SAN FRANCISCO, Oct. 6.—The examination was held to-day of Maurice B. Strelliger, known as M. B. Curtis, the actor, for the murder of Policeman Grant. Saturday Henry Jansen, who was formerly employed by Strellinger as a gardener, identified the pistol found near the scene of the murder as one belonging to Strellinger. To-day Jansen voluntarily took the stand and said his testimony given Saturday was false and that he testified then through fear of the police. He said to-day that he had never seen the pistol in his possession. The case was postponed for one week.

A Plain Notice to the Junta.

SANTIAGO, Chili, Oct. 6].—The Chilian government has evinced no intention of abandoning its position that it has a perfect right to arrest persons as they enter or leave the precincts of the American legation, but is making no attempt to put it in practice. In accordance with instructions received from the state department at Washington Minister Egan has given the junta to understand, by a formal and official notice, that if the Chilian authorities continue to maintain their present attitude the friendly relations between Chili and the United States will be interrupted.

Four Persons Incinerated.

NEW YORK, Oct. 6.—A fire in a tenement house at the corner of Hudson and Dominick street early this morning resulted in the death of Mrs. Annie Murphy, aged thirty-two; John Toohey, her son, aged nine; Josephine Ryan, her niece, aged five, and Miss Katie Dunn, a dressmaker, aged twenty-two, who boarded with the Murphys. The pecuniary loss was $1,500.

To Sue the Milwaukee.

NORTHFIELD, Minn., Special, Oct. 6.—Charles Church of this city will sue the Milwaukee for $15,000 for injuries sustained in an accident here nearly a year ago. Church had worked for the Milwaukee at Austin for some time, and had been discharged. He then began to hang about the station at this point, and was in the habit of jumping on and off the cars, presumably hiding for the regular train men in the discharge of their duty. He got in the way of a flat car containing some car wheels, which becoming loose rolled off on and onto Church.

GRAND FORKS, N. D., Special Telegram, Oct. 6.—The first number of the Daily News, a new Democratic paper, appeared this evening. It is published by the News Publishing company, with Willis R. Rierly as editor.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S CORNER.

MATTERS OF INTEREST AND INSTRUCTION TO THE YOUNG.

Getting Rid of Surplus Plants--Swift Traveling--A Sure Mark--What Was Inside--Children's Discoveries--

Getting Rid of Surplus Plants.

"Marian," he said that night, "there are several ways for you to get rid of your plant surplus. You can throw them away—"

"Go on, Mr. Bailey."

"Or you can put a sign out on the road: 'Plants sold here,' and maybe—"

"Go right on, Mr. Bailey. You know it's two miles to the main road."

"Or, which I cordially endorse, you can give them away."

"Now you are sensible, John. That is what I wanted to do. But to whom shall we give them that is the question."

"Marian, do you not remember that once last year we drove seventeen miles to the head of the valley, and in all that distance there was but one garden, and that a very shabby one, and do you not remember that there is a school-house two or three miles away, a rusty old shanty by the County road? Now, suppose you should try to get the school children to take your surplus stock. I know something about the district. Nearly all the farmers are renters, and the attendance fluctuates a good deal. After a bad season people move away, until perhaps, there will not be more than four or five children in the district; at present there are more than forty. I will drive you over there some afternoon and you can talk with the teacher and the children."

A few weeks later Mrs. Bailey gathered some of her rose-buds, and filled several boxes with little plants, all in the nicest possible condition for transplanting. Her husband took her to the folorn-looking school-house, and they introduced themselves to the elderly and tired-out teacher, Miss Sanborn. In a few minutes Mrs. Bailey was persuaded to venture upon a "talk with the children," which she managed in a way that appeared to John nothing less than pure genius. She told them how beautiful flowers were, and how ready to repay good care. Every one might have a garden, and at such slight expense. She described her own garden, and some of her methods and experiments. Then she wanted to know if there couldn't be a garden in the school-yard, close by the well, and if each boy and girl would not like to carry some plants home, and see whether they could be made to grow. The idea took at once, and the dear little lady gave each child a share in the "surplus" of her garden.

"Now, children, come and see me some Saturday afternoon and tell me how they are growing," said she. "Then we will find out who has the best garden. Perhaps we shall be able to have a flower show in a few years, and prizes for the prettiest roses. Remember, lots of water for your plants; lots of hoeing about them, and lots of attention all summer. Then you'll have loads of flowers."

Before she was half done, every child in the school-room was determined to have a garden.

Swift Travelling.

A stirring incident took place not long ago in Courbevoie, when Paul Leprince, the aeronaut, and one of his friends, made a balloon ascension. They had reached an elevation of fifteen hundred feet, when they began to hear a peculiar whistling sound. Leprince climbed upon the ring, and discovered a tear, a few inches long, made by the branch of a tree, against which they had swept in their upward passage. What followed is related by Leprince in L'Illustration.

At this moment, the sun dispelled the clouds and shone with all its force upon the balloon. This produced such an expansion of gas that the valve was not sufficient to lessen the strain, and the fabric tore apart, with a noise like the rustling of leaves. Through the opening poured the gas in great volumes.

"We are lost!" cried my friend.

"The ballast!" shouted I. "The ballast!"

In an instant two bags were thrown out. I saw by the barometer that we were nearly five thousand feet from the ground, and then the fall began. We threw out everything of any weight, and prepared to cast off our clothing, and resolved to cling, at the moment of striking, to the netting above.

Fortunately there was a strong wind blowing, which carried us along at the rate of thirty-five or forty miles an hour, and enabled us to fall at an angle, thus softening the shock.

The balloon was violently shaken in its flight, and kept swinging and swaying in a horrible manner, but this motion was, after all, what saved us.

During one of the most vigorous of these movements, the lower part of the balloon was thrown to the upper part of the netting, and rested there against the valve, in the shape of a dome, forming an immense paruchute. At once the fall was sensibly arrested, but we were still one hundred yards from the ground. The time had come to throw overboard our clothes, but there proved to be no time.

Scarcely had we reached the ropes attached to the ring; when a terrible shock was felt; and we, the basket and balloon, were rolled over on the ground together. We were not injured, nor did we even lose consciousness, and thus was a fall of nearly a mile accomplished in less than four minutes.—Companion.

A Sure Mark.

The tact that is born of true kindheartedness is a thing for which its possessor may well be admired and imitated. "I like your friend Grace Hunt a great deal better than I do Ellen Mayo," said fourteen-year-old Tom to his sister Fanny at the tea-table, one evening.

"Why?" asked Fanny in some surprise. "I am sure Ellen is a good deal brighter than Grace, and prettier, too!"

"She may be," assented Tom, doubtfully, "but I don't call her very polite. I told Grace that funny story father read us out of Mr. Black's letter today, and she laughed and said it was a splendid story, and that she should remember it and tell it to somebody else. But when I tried to tell it to Ellen Mayo, she interrupted me before I'd got half-way through, saying, 'Oh yes! I remember all about that now; your sister told me a week ago; it's about the man who—' and she went on and finished the story herself."

"It wasn't polite, of course," admitted Fanny, "but I suppose she didn't think how it would make you feel. And, Tom, the fact is, I told the story to Grace, too, at the same time Ellen heard it!"

"I don't care anything about that," said Tom, decidedly, "except I like her all the better for it. She didn't make me feel uncomfortable, and as if I was an old newspaper as Ellen did. I say she's a lady!"

"And I agree, with you, my son," said his father, "and I'll venture to predict that she's a girl who'll make few enemies, and many friends, as long as she lives."—Youth's Companion.

What Was Inside.

Georgie lives with his grandpa and grandma, and he sleeps in the room with them. One night he was very restless, tossing about and kicking anything that came within reach of his small feet. This disturbed grandpa and grandma very much, and finally grandma arose and prepared some medicine for the little boy, while grandpa awakened him.

"Here in some nice medicine," said grandma, "to make you sleep better. Open your mouth, Georgie, and take it."

"What is it?" queried Georgie.

"It is molasses," answered grandpa.

"And what you like so well in the turkey-stuffing," added grandma.

"But—what is it?" asked Georgie, drowsily.

"It's molasses," said grandpa.

"Molasses," added grandma, "and —"

"I know it's molasses," broke in Georgie, half-asleep by this time. "but what's—inside—the molasses?"

"Sage, my boy, sage!" cried grandpa.

And Georgie took the medicine without another word.

Children Discoverers.

As in many other cases of discovery that of the telescope appears to have been the result of a playful accident. Several stories are told about it, but all similar.

The one most generally accepted tells how, about the year of 1590, just 300 years ago, the children of Zachariah Jansen, a spectacle-maker, residing at Middleburg, in Holland were in their father's workshop and observed that when they held between their fingers two spectacle glasses, one some distance before the other, and looked through them at the weather-cock of the church it seemed inverted, but very much nearer to them and greatly increased in size.

Their father, when his attention was called, saw that one of the glasses was convex and the other concave. He made experiments and ended by fixing such glasses in wooden tubes a few inches long and selling them for curiosities. Another account tells us how one Lipperscheim discovered the telescope in a similar manner. Descartel, however, a cotemporary, gives the credit to James Metius, a glass-cutter in Holland, whose brother, a professor of mathematics and a maker of burning glasses and mirrors, hit upon the discovery in the same way that Jansen's children are said to have done.

Punctuality.

A distinguished warrior, who was noted for his punctuality, once said that he would just as soon have a man come five minutes behind time, as five minutes ahead of time. What he wanted, was for the man to be there to the minute. We may not all agree with the warrior, but surely there is no one who cannot see the advantages that are to be gained by being on time.

"Punctuality is the soul of business," reads an old adage; and not only does this apply to business-life, but to our every-day life. "Time is money," and it is no more just to waste a man's time by not being punctual than it is to take away his money or his clothes.

Be punctual, boys and girls, and you will find yourself better satisfied and your fellow creatures will appreciate the efforts [illegible].

Keep out of Debt.

Every one who has a fixed income of any kind can and ought so to regulate his expenditures as to bring them within it. This is a habit which should be inculcated in the earliest years. The child, with an allowance for its pleasures, be it ever so small, should never be suffered to exceed it or to draw upon the future. The youth should be taught to undergo self-denial rather than to borrow the money to obtain a gratification. There is more true independence in this lesson than in hundreds of shouts or boasts of liberty which too often only convey the idea of casting off duty and obligation.—Philadelphia Ledger.

HERE'S A POINTER.

How to Guess With Some Certainty on Dates of Silver Quarters.

At the club the other day one of the members pulled out a handful of small change to pay his bill, says the Albany Argus.

"Have you any quarters?" said one who was sitting near.

"Yes, four. Do you want to borrow them?"

"No, But what will you bet that I cannot guess the dates on them?"

"I do not know what your trick is; but for a flyer I will bet the coins themselves."

"Done. I will name these dates: 1853, 1854, and two of 1876, Am I right?"

"Let me see. One is 1854; this is 1877; this is 1876, and this is 1853. You guessed three correctly and missed one. So you owe me a quarter and I owe you 75 cents. Now explain your trick."

"It is no trick. The fancy took me a few weeks ago to examine the dates on coins and I found that almost every quarter bears one of these dates, with an occasional 1856, 1857, 1858, 1878. I suppose more of them were coined in those years. During he weeks I have been interested in the subject I have seen one 1861, but not a single other quarter bearing date in the sixties or in the seventies except as I have mentioned. If one wanted to bet as we have just done we could be a sure winner in the long run."

I witnessed the transaction, and it interested me so that I looked the matter up. In the report of the director of the mint I found a full explanation. In that is a table giving the coinage in different denominations for each year since the organization of the mints. The coinage of quarters has fluctuated in a most remarkable way. Beginning with 1850 for three years the coinage averaged about $40,000 a year. Then in 1853 it jumped up to $3,813,555. In 1854 it was almost as much, $3,095,000. Then it dropped to $714,260 in 1855. In 1856 it was $1,816,000. In 1857, $2,411,000, and in 1858, $1,842,000. Then it dropped again, never rising to $400,000, and in war times averaging only $5,000 or $6,000 except in 1861, when it was $1,213,650. In 1875 it was $1,073,375; in 1876, $4,454,287.50; in 1877, $2,727,927.50. Then began the coinage of silver dollars by the millions, and the production of subsidiary coins dropped way off. For the past ten years the coinage on quarters has averaged only $3,000 or $4,000.

Just examine the dates on the quarters that come into your possession and see how they bear out these statistics. For instance, in 1886 there were only $1,471.50 in quarters coined, and there are a thousand chances to one against a coin of this date coming into your hands.

TERRIBLE AFRICAN ANT.

A Voracious Creature Which Devours Everything Within Its Reach.

There are a great many species of ants in Africa, some of which are found in vast numbers, says the New York Advertiser. The most remarkable and most dreaded of all is the bashikouay, and is a most voracious creature, which carries nothing away but eats its prey on the spot.

It is the dread of all living animals of the forest—the elephant, the leopard, the gorilla, and all the insect world—the man himself is compelled to flee before the advance of these marauders, or to protect himself by fire and boiling water. It is the habit of the bashikouays to march through the forest in a long, regular line, about two inches broad or more, and often miles in length.

All along the line large ants, who act as officers, stand outside the ranks and keep the regular army in order. If they come to a place where there are no trees to shelter them from the sun, the heat of which they can not bear they immediately burrow underground and form tunnels. It often takes more than twelve hours for one of these armies to pass.

When they grow hungry, at a certain command, which seems to take place all along the line at the same time, the long file spreads itself through the forest in a front line and attacks and devours all it overtakes with a fury that is quite irresistible. All the other living inhabitants of the forest flee before it. Their advent is known beforehand; the still forest becomes alive with the trampling of the elephant, the flight of the antelope or of the gazelle, of the leopard, of snakes, all the living world, in the same direction where the other animals are fleeing away.

Their manner of attack is an impetuous leap. Instantly the strong pincers are fastened, and they only let go when the piece gives way. They even ascend to the tops of trees for their prey. This ant seems to be animated by a kind of fury.

Sometimes men condemned to death are made fast to a tree, and if an army of hungry bashikouays passes, in a short time only bare skeletons remain to tell the tale.

The Greek Church.

The orthodox ecclesiastics have met in Moscow to discuss the method of checking the wandering from the Greek Church. The increase of sects is so rapid as to constitute a danger not only to the church, but to the state. It was proposed that all the sectarians should be forbidden to leave their own villages and to try all offenders against the faith not by ordinary jury, but by a special judge, and furthermore that the orthodox missionaries should be increased in number who should "strive in all love and charity to bring back the lost sheep."

A NOTORIOUS LIAR'

But He Told a Half Truth When He Was Dying.

Burrows was, without doubt, the most notorious liar Nevada will ever shelter, says the New York Sun. His fame as a liar spread for a hundred miles around, and men used to stop at our camp to get a look at him. He wasn't a wicked man, and he had no malice about him, but he was a natural born liar. He lied about his father, his mother, his wife, brothers, sisters, and everybody else, and for every hour in the day he had a new falsehood.

One day a lot of earth and rock caved in on him and inflicted fatal injuries, and a number of us knocked off work to be with him in his last moments. Lying there with only an hour of life left to him, he told us that he had been a pirate on the Pacific, and where he had buried a large amount of plunder. We all knew that he was from Ohio, and had never seen an ocean.

One of the men finally felt it his duty to say:

"Burrows, you have only a short time to live. You had best spend that in preparing for eternity."

"I've allus been good," he quietly replied.

"Yes, but you are an awful liar, you know."

"I suppose so. I've told a million, haven't I?"

"No doubt of it."

"And every one has been laid up agin' me?"

"Very likely."

"Well, boys, it's my way, and I can't change at this late day. Just as that cave-in came I struck a nugget as big as my head. It would value up a clean $15,000. If you'll be kind enough to pull it out and sell it and send the cash to my wife I'll die feeling better.

He went off soon after that, and we said to each other that he had given us the greatest yarn of all. No one took his claim, which was accounted a poor one, and it lay for three months before one of the boys dug into it one day for the pick-ax buried and forgotten. He hadn't got the pick when he came across a lump of gold which balanced $13,280 in coin, and every shilling of the money was sent on to the widow.

It got to Ohio to find there was no widow.

In his dying hour Burrows told the truth about his find, but repented of it, and lied about having a wife.

THE OCEAN CURE.

English Doctors Beneficially Advise the Sailing Vessel for Consumptives.

Though the sailing vessel has gone out of fashion with travelers, it still has its uses and its peculiar excellences. As a health restorer it certainly greatly surpasses the steamer, on which the passenger is hardly at sea in the fullest sense, since the steam engines, the sight and smell of smoke. the stairways, the carpets and the easy-chairs continually take his senses back to the land.

Lately the use of the sailing vessel as a means of bringing back health to certain classes of invalids, and particulary to consumptives, has become a regular system in England, and its results have been submitted to thorough and statistical study.

The "ocean cure" for consumptives is practiced by English physicians in this way: The patient is ordered to embark at the end of the month of September on a sailing vessel bound for Australia. Once past Cape Finisterre—for Europeans, in former times, the "end of the earth"—the traveler may see no land for two or three months. He is far at sea, with little to remind him of anything in his past life, breathing an atmosphere which is free from dust and smoke, and also freer then any atmosphere on land from the microbes which often cause disease.

For the most part, he is in a kindly climate, and the slow progress of his vessel accustoms him gradually to such changes of air as he must undergo.

He arrives in Australia in summer of that latitude. Here he is advised to remain for a month or six weeks, and then to re-embark on a sailing vessel bound for England. Ordinarily he reaches England on his return in June, when the dangers to consumptives from the climate of that country are well-nigh past.

Out of fifty-six cases of consumptives, in which this treatment was followed and of which records were kept, forty-four reported marked improvement. In five cases the condition remained the same; in four it became worse, and only one patient died.—Youth's Companion.

A Real Mean Man.

A party of men about town were seated in a cafe one night when the conversation turned upon mean men. The old stories were told about the man who was too mean to buy a collar button, utilizing a wart on the back of his neck for that purpose, and the man who took long steps so that his shoes wouldn't wear out so quickly. A man sitting in the corner said he had discovered the meanest man in Philadelphia, and vouched for the truth of his story. "I asked him to take a drink with me" he said, "so we went to the Bellevue, and what did the fellow do but order a champagne cocktail. That struck me as being a little steep, but I paid the bill, and, of course, said nothing, thinking I would get back at him. He didn't suggest anything, so we went out. Walking up the street, we happened to pass a fruit stand, when my generous friend said: 'By the way 'it's my treat now. What'll you have?' I picked out an apple, and he laid down a cent. 'Aren't you going to take anything yourself?' I asked. 'No,' he replied, 'I never eat fruit.' I left him at the next corner."—Philadelphia Record.

The two splendid volumes of General Grant's Memoirs, of which 650,000 copies have already been sold—not a cheap edition, but the best—for 50 cents; PROVIDED you send your subscription to the NEWS for one year, and also a subscription of $3 for the Cosmopolitan magazine, the brightest and cheapest of the great illustrated monthlies, itself equal to the best $4 magazine.

The Cosmopolitan is enabled to make this offer because of the purchase of 600,000 volumes at a price which even publishers would deem impossible, and with the idea of running up its circulation to half a million copies. By contract with the Cosmopolitan the NEWS is enabled to offer to its readers a share in the low price obtained through the largest purchase of books ever made in the history of the world.

If, however, you have Grant's books, the Cosmopolitan's offer will permit you to take instead,

Gen. Sherman's Memoirs, 2 vols., sold by subscription for $5 00.
Gen. Sheridan's Memoirs, 2 vols. sold by subscription for $6.00.
Gen. McClelland's Memoirs, sold by subscription for..........$3.75.

All of these are bound in cloth, green and gold, in uniform style with Grant's Memoirs.

The Cosmopolitan and the NEWS are sent postage prepaid, but the postage on the books, at the rate of ½ cent per ounce, must be remitted with the order: Gen. Grants' Memoirs, 96 ounces, 48 cents; Gen. Sheridan's Memoirs, 92 oz.—46 cents; Gen. Sherman's Memoirs 84 oz—42 cents; Gen. McClellan's Memoirs, 48 oz.—24, cents, or books can be sent by express at the expense of the subscriber.

Send at once $3.00 for a year's subscription to the Cosmopolitan, $1.00 for a year's subscription to the NEWS and 50 cents for a set of Memoirs—$4.50 in all—to which add postage on the particular set of Memoirs selected.

If you are not acquainted with the magazine, send a postal card to the Cosmopolitan, Madison Square, New York City, for free sample copy.

man with. Miss Chenier on the bluff yonder."

He looked, and when he had succeeded in finding the proper line of vision he started, not perceptibly to any one but himself, and watched the little tableau develop as has been described.

"It is some friend to Miss Chenier," he presently said, as Mrs. Roosevelt came upon the scene, "but I do not know him. He must be a visitor to Savannah, I think; a northerner, possibly."

"But he is not a northerner," said Mrs. Farley. "His face and manner deny the possibility. He may be a north Georgian, however."

Colonel Talbot lowered the glass and looked at his companion.

"He would be her mountain lover, then," he said, smiling complacently, and turning the opera glass over and over in his hand.

"Well, neither you nor I need care as to that," she replied. "But I do wonder who he is."

She took the glass and looked again.

"Ah, Mrs. Roosevelt has joined them," she exclaimed. "He is no stranger to her, that is plain. He is strikingly handsome—distingue—a military man, possibly. I wish I could hear what he is saying. No doubt it is vastly interesting."

Mrs. Farley was a clever woman, and she rarely did or said anything, no matter how apparently light and unstudied, without having some well defined object in view. She had begun to suspect that Colonel Talbot felt some sort of tender interest in Miss Chenier, and she was now endeavoring to surprise him into something like a confession of it. But he was too reserved and self poised to be caught in her slender net. He knew her better than she thought, and he played with her webs without seeming aware of their existence.

Ellis did not remain long at Bonaventure. After a short conversation with Mrs. Roosevelt and her niece he went away, but not before Rosalie had invited him to call at the mansion.

CHAPTER XI.

LETTERS.

She kissed her uncle.

One day Rosalie's banjo came by express. This was in response to a request she had embodied in a letter to her father after she had striven in vain to make the fine old piano in Mrs. Roosevelt's parlor banish her desire for the simpler instrument. No doubt it was a very foolish act to kiss the banjo, but she did it with genuine passion. Had it not been her beloved companion from her childhood? Was it not one of the old mill's inmates throughout her sweet, crude life in the "pocket?" Ought it not to share her happiness in this ampler life at the Roosevelt mansion? She turned its keys, she swept its strings. Its pure, short notes cut through air that never before had palpitated with music so plebeian. The sounds brought quick tears to her eyes, and her lips quivered. It would be unjust to say that any foolish sentiment caused her emotion. A very natural homesickness had preyed upon her mind at intervals since coming to Savannah, and of course every letter from the "pocket" and every other special reminder of the old mill aggravated the malady, and it was with a feeling of relief that Rosalie turned from the banjo to read one addressed to her uncle from Mr. Edgar Julian.

"Here is something that may interest you," Mr. Roosevelt had said, as he handed her this missive postmarked at some town in the south of France. "The latter part of it is really meant for you to read. I judge you will be charmed with it."

"Oh, it is from Mr. Julian," she exclaimed, almost joyfully, as she glanced at the signature. "He is in the south of France, sure enough. And such a long letter!"

She kissed her uncle in thankful anticipation of some news from "le Chateau Chenier," and ran off to the nearest window seat to read.

Mr. Roosevelt stood for a moment contemplating her. This was the first time his fascinating adopted daughter had ever kissed him. He was a shrewd old fellow; he suspected that kiss as being meant to go clear across the Atlantic. He thought it not worth while to make any remarks, however, and with a bland smile on his semi-Jewish face he went away to his office.

Rosalie's hand trembled as she held the letter. Her eyes ran rapidly over the clear, rather small writing, scarcely the half of which had anything to do with Mr. Roosevelt's business. Evidently Mr. Edgar Julian had done valiant and valuable work in behalf of the railroad schemes of his employers, for he had sent back the contract of the "Dutch Syndicate" duly approved, signed and sealed. A matter so completely finished needed very few words of explanation. But turning from railroad diplomacy to something which seemed to interest him pleasantly, he wrote as follows:

"I promised Miss Chenier that I would look up the old estate in Provence to which her father thought he might have some claim." (It may be said here that Rosalie could not remember any such promise.) "I have seen le Chateau Chenier—it still bears the name; a most lovely old ruin in the midst of vineyards and fig orchards, and rimmed round with olive crowned hills. The chateau itself is not inhabitable, save that one tumble down wing has been kept as a pretense of shelter for a family of peasants, of a very low order, I should say; but the place has been a grand one.

"If one had lived a few hundred years ago one would have loved such a home, for it was then a fair castle in the center of the world's most charming region. The estate is quite valuable even now, and its ownership seems in doubt. After all, Miss Chenier's father may be the rightful claimant. If he could establish his title a few thousand dollars judiciously expended would make the whole place a garden of beauty. This climate is enchanting. I should like to settle here with a colony of my own picking. The wind, and the sunshine, and the fragrance of things fill one with a sense of the value of mere existence. But the people are dry and stolid on the one hand, or gushing and monstrously inclined to exaggeration on the other. I hold that no country whose laboring classes wear sabots is safe to live in. It has the appearance of decay in its last stage. Sandals, bare feet and wooden shoes are not the accompaniments of progress. In walking about among the people and the buildings here I am constantly reminded of ashes.

"Indeed, I am not sure but that the fervent sun of this climate has slowly burned up everything. Such energy as we have in our great west might not be able to resist it through many generations, especially if we should fall into this wine drinking habit. Everywhere one goes here one sees wine used like water, and a great deal of it is a villainous sour stuff unfit for hogs to drink. * * * They tell us that this region was once the center of European literary culture; that here the fragrant dregs of Roman civilization, and, through the Roman, the Greek artistic refinements, were left over after Italy had become a cinder. These lemon groves and vineyards, these old chateaux, these stony hills and drowsy valleys ought to be the ideal region for the poets; but it seems they could not stay; the climate made dust of them by a dreamy process of slow combustion. Some of the old picturesque things and some of the poetical customs still linger here, and there is a sort of Rose-of-Provence odor and dewiness on the night air which quite compensates for the daytime sultriness.

"If you deem it worth while you may let Miss Chenier read this. She spoke to me of Provence and her father's attachment for this particular region, and while I hardly feel at liberty to write to her directly, I have hoped that this method of sending her a mere sketch of her ancestral country might not be thought impertinent.

"Le Chateau Chenier seems to be the oldest place in this immediate neighborhood, not only on account of its ruined condition, but judging from the character of its architecture. The landed estate pertaining to the chateau is of considerable extent, and might be made exceedingly remunerative by intelligent management. Yesterday I stood upon a sort of ruined tower and looked over the landscape. If Miss Chenier could have seen it she would have been in love more than ever with the supposed birthplace of her ancestors. It is an old neglected garden of the south."

Rosalie read and reread the letter, lingering over the descriptive sentences, and striving to get at what was not expressed. She tried to make out from the writer's elusive touches an outline of the chateau and its environs. The effort was futile. Her imagination took light hold of the sordid part of this Provencal heritage. It busied itself more vigorously with the fine poetical romance. Rosalie was not impractical, however, and one of her first thoughts was of sending this letter, or a copy of certain parts of it, to her father. He would be interested if not benefited. Anything concerning Provence captivated his attention at once. In this he was a typical southerner of the highest order.

After she had finally done with the letter and had prepared excerpts from it for her father, Rosalie went about the house for days with sunny visions of Provence blending with sweet memories of the little valley of north Georgia. She was preparing for a party her aunt had arranged to give. There were many things to do—mere trifles, of course, but necessary. Between duties she played upon the banjo, and sang the old simple songs with a power and tenderness of expression that charmed Mr. Roosevelt.

Colonel Talbot called quite frequently, and his attentions to Rosalie were a source of trouble to aunt Marguerite, who could not even remotely contemplate the possibilities suggested without the keenest pangs of selfishness. Rosalie was her treasure, her life.

Of course, as for Colonel Talbot, he was a most honorable man, of high family and ample fortune. The connection would be a desirable one in many respects, but the thought of losing Rosalie was more distasteful than death itself. There is no love so foolishly selfish and strong as the love of the old for the young.

CHAPTER XII.

A GENIUS FROM THE UP COUNTRY.

In her extreme and somewhat childish solicitude touching the proper management of Rosalie's affairs Mrs. Roosevelt found herself in quite a dilemma. Young Ellis had begun to call at the mansion, and had managed to make a very favorable impression upon Mr. Roosevelt. To say the truth this dashing, eloquent mountaineer had brought with him from the "up country" just enough of the atmosphere of adventure and daring to have a romantic effect, and he had won friends quite rapidly. His manners were a shade freer than the conventional "low country" aristocrats affected; but his bearing was proud and his personal appearance extremely agreeable; and then his voice—no one ever heard it without feeling its persuasive influence.

As a background for all his claims upon Savannah society Mr. Ellis came of an old and famous family. His ancestors, both paternal and maternal, had distinguished themselves in Colonial times, and in the Floridian, the Mexican and the late wars. They had been a race of office holders, rich, powerful, hospitable, renowned. Such antecedents held a magical power which would fling wide the social gates of the aristocrats of the low country. The mere matter of his having broken the United States revenue laws was not to be considered against him, especially since the affair had been amicably adjusted. His boldness, cleverness and dashing bravery were set down to his credit. He was a true example of chivalry.

There may have been just a touch of the brigandish in his character, as seen in certain lights and from occasional chance points of view; but this only served to enhance his power by adding the fascination of romance. Given youth, beauty, ancestral grandeur and fine personal address, the one finishing touch that remains is the subtle gift of defiance of law which is said to be always present with genius. The sultry imagination of the south dearly reverences such defiance so long as it is not leveled at the old institutions of aristocracy; and this imagination particularly relishes antinomian tendencies in the line of contempt of northern rules, among which are counted the revenue laws. In some way Mr. Ellis embodied this irrepressible southern defiance. He looked it, and his past career had accorded with it.

Rosalie went to meet them.

On the other hand, he was gentle, sweet voiced and almost amiable. He had many of the elements of greatness, not the least of which was enthusiasm and perfect self reliance. His operations in illicit distilling had been on a rather grand scale, and his profits had been correspondingly heavy; but his masterly tact and skill had been shown to best advantage in his settlement of the whole matter with the revenue officials in such a way as to save his fortune and his liberty as well. He had come to Savannah with the reputation of a brilliant fellow. In fact, he was everywhere privately discussed as a hero, his achievements and adventures losing nothing in the course of frequent telling. He was well aware of his prestige, and very quietly he pursued the advantage it gave him. He had determined to turn his energies to strictly legitimate pursuits; but, while nominally a broker in cotton, his thoughts were fixed on large schemes in another channel. He saw the broad field that the south offered for railroad building, especially southern Georgia and Florida, to which field Savannah held the key. He began at once to study the situation of all the railroads of Florida, and to gather information relative to certain proposed lines. It was not long till he had mastered such knowledge as promised to serve his turn. He planned boldly, but with great care.

Before Mr. Roosevelt was aware of any move, the intrepid tyro in his own field had got firm control of three proposed routes, with land grants attached, in Florida, and was negotiating with New York capitalists for placing the bonds and procuring money and iron for building. It had been so cleverly executed that Mr. Roosevelt was compelled to admire and respect the genius of the man who had originated it. But it called for prompt action. A telegram was sent to Mr. Largely requiring him to come to Savannah at once. An outline of the dangerous break in the plan they had made at Chicago, caused by this brilliant coup of Ellis', was embodied in the dispatch. The answer was short but it meant a good deal:

Mortgage Sale.—Default having been made in the payment of the sum of fourteen hundred twenty-five and 33-100 dollars, ($1425.33) which is claimed to be due at the date of this notice upon a certain mortgage, duly executed and delivered by Thomas Perusse and Delima Perusse, his wife, to Josephine Majeau, bearing date the 2d day of June, A. D, 1886, and, with a power of sale therein contained, duly recorded in the office of the register of deeds in and for the county of Polk and State of Minnesota, on the 16th day June, A. D. 1886, at 9:30 o'clock a. m., in book T of mortgages, on page 224 therein, and no action or proceeding having been instituted, at law or otherwise, to recover the debt secured by said mortgage, or any part thereof. Now,

Therefore, notice is hereby given, that by virtue of the power of sale contained in said mortgage, and pursuant to the statute in such case made and provided, the said mortgage will be foreclosed by a sale of the premises described in and conveyed by said mortgage, viz:

The northwest quarter of section three in township one hundred and fifty north, of range forty three west in Polk county and state of Minnesota, with the hereditaments and appurtenances; which sale will be made by the sheriff of said Polk county, at the front door of the court house, in the city of Crookston in said county and state, on the 14th day of November, A. D. 1891, at 10 o'clock a. m., of that day, at public vendue, to the highest bidder for cash, to pay said debt and interest, and [illegible] on said premises, and fifty dollars attorney's fees, as stipulated in and by said mortgage in case of foreclosure, and the disbursements allowed by law: subject to redemption at any time within one year from the day of sale as provided by law.

For a year or more there have been repeated assevations to the rumor that Kretzschmar's hall was unsafe for a large crowd, arising, doubtless, from the fact that a post underneath had once gotten loose! The hall has a good foundation. The cellars underneath each store room are small excavations ten feet wide and running north and south. Otherwise it is on solid basis, and has often enough been tested with immence crowds and dances to quiet all reasonable fears.

Ovide Moreau came over from Terrebonne Monday and took the train for Grand Forks the next morning.

Had the attraction at the Opera house Monday night been anything less magnetic than the Northern favorite, "Uncle Tom's Cabin" the number of people attending would have been considerably less. But miry streets and a dark night were unnoticed and the house was full. The entertainment was acceptable, even the absence of special scenery, which is half the play, not having a disastrous effect. The company is not a very strong one, still the structure as a whole will float safely on the turbid sea of public demands. The comedians were good, especially Marks and Miss Ophelia, who showed striking originality at times. The specialties, such as violin and clarionette solos, banjo playing and bell ringing, had a tendency to elevate the tone of the whole, and this might be said especially of the orchestra, some of its selections being masterly, while all were excellent. The soul of humor in this popular drama is always looked for in "Topsy," and no disappointment followed, Monday night. It were hard to locate the fountain of fun in this creature, but it is safe to say it lies in her mouth. Her conception of the character is immense, and her delineations side-splitting. Her tastes being so delicate and finely chiseled, that humor and pathos, find a trysting-place with her. She is gone, now, and only the possession of her likeness assuages the anguish of the thought.

Dr. John Watson made a trip to the northern part of the county, about 28 miles distant, last week, which is worth recording. It was night, and the rain was dashing down in torrents, the wind blew hard and biting cold. The roads were in a fearful condition, as every now and then the horses would mire deep into the mucky soil, while the buggy was at times half filled with water and the light on the dashboard extinguished. The doctor arrived at his destination, after overcoming all these difficulties, and thus adds another adventure so many of which are experienced by practicing M. D.'s.

Marshal Mead thought he had a sensation to grapple with Tuesday night, when a fellow rushed into the Star saloon looking for the marshal. He was a railroad hand much the worse from intoxicants, his face was covered with blood and wore a decidedly wild look. He said he wanted to be arrested; that he had just murdered a man and a crowd was after him with lynching apparatus; the corpse of the victim was outside, a few steps off; the marshal should lock him up before the crowd overtook him. Charlie didn't turn pale, but perhaps did lose a little of his accustomed sangfroid and followed the man out to look for the "stiff." The latter article couldn't be found anywhere, though the self accuser still laid claim to the distinction of having dispatched a man, and his consequent right to a lodging in the cooler. The facts of the case were that the fellow had a touch of the delerium tremens. He was eventually locked up to his immense relief.

Peter Perrault, while out huntingMonday with a muzzle loading gun, met with a severe accident wherein he nearly lost his right hand. He had loaded the gun and used an elongated lead bullet, ramming it down so hard that it flattened out and got tightly wedged into the barrel of the gun. Upon firing off the gun an explosion took place, the charge tearing off the butt of the gun and literally tearing Perrault's right hand asunder. Dr. Lemieux was called to dress the laceration and thinks the chances good for saving the hand whole.

Two prisoners are said to have escaped from the Crookston jail by rushing past the jailor as he was carrying in wood. They were in for larceny committed in East Grand Forks. A searching party arrived in town yesterday who reported having been on their track and within sight of the men for a time. They are supposed to have made their way to the Clearwater woods and all trace of them is lost.

Crookston is thinking of building a new jail—at the county's expense, of course.

J Laframboise, the prosperous Gentilly farmer, believes there is great profit in sheepraising and he bases his belief on experience. For several years he has been increasing his flock of sheep and improving the grade by introducing new blooded rams. A couple of weeks ago he purchased a Leicester and Cotaword ram, imported from Upper Canada. He shears from some of his sheep 23 pounds of wool which readily markets at 18 cents per pound—about $4.00 from the wool alone. A common sheep will sell for $3 in ordinary seasons, making the sheep bring $8. Mr. Laframboise says his sheep do not cost him more than 75 cents a head during the entire year. He has a slight advantage in the fact that in the summer they can be herded on vacant lands in his vicinity for 25 cents the entire season. This will be so for several years to come, till the land is all taken, after which pastures will be necessary. In winter they are very little trouble. Straw is to them an acceptable diet while a small allowance of screenings, which can be bought for 15 cents a sack, suffices for desert. If our farmers paid more attention to sheep raising they would have fatter purses.

SHE HAD A CHICAGO COLD.

She is the sweetest girl in town;
Her manner's nice and pleases;
Her eyes and hair are fair and brown,
And soft as Summer breezes.
Ah, me! 'tis sweet those Autumn nights
To wander 'neath the treeses,
And tell her of the passion deep
My throbbing heart that seizes.
But that's as far as I have gone,
For there my ardor freezes,
Because I think a hurricane
Has struck me when she sneezes.

STRIKE AT ELM HOLLOW.

WE were sitting on the piazza in the twilight of a warm summer day, which we had spent in visiting a large manufactory in a neighboring city. One of the foremen in this establishment, a fine manly young fellow, Joe Jamieson by name, was a favorite in my uncle's family, and always acknowledged a great indebtedness to my cousins Robert and Edward for his start in life.

I had seen Jamieson so often and heard his name spoken with so much consideration, that I was curious to know the story of his life. To-night, in reply to my questions Cousin Ned gave me this account of it.

"Five years ago this summer, we had our great Elm Hollow strike. I suppose you never saw a report of that in the papers?"

"No I replied, "What the world could any one find to strike about in this out-of-the way place?"

"It was a school strike," said Ned. "We had an excellent teacher that summer, and as there were no more than thirty scholars, we had a chance to do some pretty good work.

"Our teacher, Miss Ward, had taught the school for a year and we thought there was no one like her. She took a great deal of pains, and helped us in every way she could.

"Our class, the first one, was composed of five boys. We were doing well in our studies, but we were not wise enough to appreciate it.

We were studying history and civil government, and Miss Ward encouraged us to read the newspapers and keep informed about public events. She would take a few minutes occasionally to ask us questions about what we had read, and explain matters we did not understand. In this way we learned a great deal about what was happening in the world.

"That summer the papers were full of accounts of strikes in one place, and lockouts in another, with workmen combining against employers, and employers against workmen.

"One day, after eating our lunch, the boys of our class were all lying on the grass, discussing the latest news about the strikes.

"'I say, fellows,' said Harry Rogers, 'here we are shut up by ourselves in this little-out-of-the-way place, where nothing ever happens to 'liven a fellow up. Let's do something the way they do it in the rest of the world. Let's have a strike!"

"'What are you going to strike about?" asked Fred Andrews.

"'Oh, we'll put in a petition,' said Harry, 'and if it isn't granted, we'll march out in a body. That's the way they always do.'

"'What shall we petition for?"

"'Oh, longer nooning, for one thing.'

"'And to have school dismissed earlier,' said another boy.

"'And for shorter algebra lessons, this warm weather,' said another.

"That afternoon Jack Burns wrote out the petition,' and each one signed it. I don't remember all our demands, but we wanted the morning recess lengthened to half an hour, the nooning to an hour and a half, and the day's session shortened by half an hour. We gave up the afternoon's recess. So much for hours.

"In regard to work, in warm weather the lessons were to be shortened, and algebra never to exceed five problems; and we were to be allowed to study out of doors when we wished.

"The paper closed with the statement that if our requests were not all granted by Thursday—that day was Tuesday—we should leave school in a body. It was important that we should go out 'in a body.' That phrase always occurred in the reports of strikes.

"We knew that the trustees, as well as our parents, were not a little proud of their first class, and we thought that, in their anxiety to keep us in the school, they would do almost anything we might ask. It was therefore, with a good deal of confidence, that, after school, we handed the paper to Miss Ward. She merely bowed, and laid it on her desk without looking at it. Nothing remained for us but to file out.

"All the next day we were in a fever of excitement, but Miss Ward said nothing, though when we had our 'history talk' she spoke of a strike that had been especially disastrous to the strikers. Their employers had refused to take them back, and their families were in want.

"Thursday morning just before school was called, we asked Miss Ward if our demands were to be granted. She replied that, having no authority herself to change the hours, she had sent our petition to the trustees, and as she had heard nothing from them, the school would go on as usual.

"Perhaps the trustees might come during the morning. We gave them the benefit of the doubt and decided to stay until recess.

"Recess came, but no trustees. We went to Miss Ward and told her that, while we had nothing against her, we must leave the school, as the trustees had not acceded to our demands. She talked to us, tried to convince us that we were taking a very foolish step; but when the bell rang, we did not go in.

"We had been lying on the grass just across the road, for a time, joking and telling stories" when I noticed that Jack was looking at the schoolhouse in a wistful way, and was not listening to the talk.

"'Sorry you struck, Jack?" I asked in fun.

"'Yes,' he said, springing to his feet 'I am! I know it seems mean for me to go against you boys, especially when I wrote the petition, but I believe we'd better give it up and go back to school. I'm sorry, boys, but I'm going back, anyhow.'

"He picked up his hat and dinner-pail.

"Jack and I were the same age and had always been good friends. His 'treachery' made me angry. I am afraid I spoke pretty harshly to him, and so did the other boys; but he kept on.

"There were only four of us now, but we agreed to 'stick it out.'

"The next morning Bob and I made no movement toward getting ready to go to school after breakfast.

"'Aren't you going to school, boys?' father asked.

"'No, sir,' I said. 'We are out on strike.'

"'Oho!' said he. 'Then the strike came off, did it? How many of you are out?'

"'Four,' said Rob. "Jack Burns didn't have spunk enough to stay in it.'

"'Well,' said father, 'I am inclined to think Jack has as much spunk as any of you. He certainly has more sense.' With that, he turned and walked away.

"Later in the day Rob and I met Fred and Harry, and we all decided not to speak to Jack. Poor Jack! He felt pretty sore when we passed him that day without paying any attention to him, though he tried hard not to show it. It was a little hard, too, to crush him in that way, but we felt that it had to be done,

"Well, Monday morning came, and that's where Joe Jamieson's part of the story begins. Joe's parents had been very poor and had never got ahead in the world. They died when Joe was very young and left him to take care of himself.

"He wasn't very strong, but he had grit, and that helped him. He worked around for different farmers, and though there was some talk at first of sending him to the poorhouse, when he showed that he could take care of himself they let him do so.

"He had been working two years for father, and was a great overgrown, awkward fellow, but a steady workman and always so good natured that we all liked him.

"That morning, at the breakfast table, father asked:

"'Is the strike still "on," boys?'

"'Yes, sir,' we both answered very promptly.

"'You don't intend to go back to school, then?'

"We said that we proposed to stay out till our petition was granted.

"Father didn't speak for a few minutes; then he turned to Joe.

"'Joe,' he said, how would you like to go to school?"

"Joe started, grinned and looked greener than ever, but said nothing. He thought father was making a joke at his expense; and Rob and I thought so, too, and were considerably amused until he went on.

"'Well!" father continued, when you finish your breakfast, Joe, you can change your clothes and get ready for school.'

"You ought to have seen Joe then! If he wasn't surprised I never saw anyone who was.

"But what about the work, Mr. Howard?' he stammered.

"'The boys will do that,' father said.

"'Why, father!" said Bob, 'you don't expect Ned and me to do farm work?"

"'Why not?' father asked." 'I've fed and clothed you, and hired Joe to do the work that you might have time for something else. In return I have asked that you attend school and do the best you can in your studies. Now you refuse to do that any longer. If Joe, here, is willing to go to school and do what I expected you to do, why, I'm willing to give him the chance. Turn about is fair play, and I shall expect you and Ned, between you, to do the work.

"'Remember,' he continued, 'I have let you make your own choice in this matter of the strike, and haven't tried to coerce you. Miss Ward reasoned with you, and did her best to make you see how foolish your act was; but you refused to listen.

"'Now there is no more to be said about it, one way or the other. The matter is settled.

"'I think you are both old enough to use your own judgment, so I have let you follow your own course. But now, if I am to support you longer, and you refuse to repay me in the way I wish, it's only fair you should make some other return.'

"By that time there was a big lump in my throat, and I wished the strike had never been thought of. I guess Rob did, too, for he was staring hard at his plate.

"I looked at mother, but she said nothing.

"After breakfast Rob and I went upstairs, put on our old clothes without a word, and went out to work. In addition to Joe, father kept another man, so the hardest of the labor did not fall to us, though what did was quite hard enough to make the days seem very long.

"Joe had his share of discomfort, too; shut up indoors all day, and obliged to be in classes with much younger children. Besides all this, he had never learned to apply himself, and for a while he made but little progress.

"However, as time went on he improved. Miss Ward was very kind to him, and he was determined to succeed, if only 'to please Mr. Howard.'

At first Joe was ashamed to come to Rob and me for help in his studies, but before long Rob offered to assist him. After that we both took a hand, and he improved fast. All this time he helped us with the farm work at night and in the morning.

"Those were very long days that we spent at the farm work. Our hands were made sore with pitchforks, and our legs ached pitifully every night. We began to talk in a furtive, half-ashamed way at first, and then openly of surrendering.

"We had been working about two weeks when we went to father one evening and told him that we should like to go back to school.

"'But how about Joe? he asked abruptly and in surprise.

"We had not thought about the injustice of taking Joe out of school now. We said no more.

"We did a good deal of thinking in those days, however. We wondered at first why Harry Rogers didn't come to see us; but one day we heard that Harry's father had set him at work on the farm too.

"Jack kept right on at school, but now he avoided us so as not to give us another chance to snub him. I wished a good many times that I had stood by him, as I had always done before. When I thought of all the cruel things I said the afternoon he went back to school, I thoroughly despised myself.

"One afternoon when I was driving in the wagon, whom should I see ahead of me but Jack, walking slowly along with his head down, and looking forlorn enough. I made up my mind to speak to him and see if he was willing to forgive and forget, though I would not have blamed him if he were not. He was going the same way I was, and didn't see me till I drove along beside him. Then he looked up.

"His face flushed and he turned his head quickly away, pretending not to see me. Something stuck in my throat but I managed to say, 'Hello, Jack.'

"It was pretty feeble, but he heard it and looked up with a quick, 'Hello, Ned!"

"I stopped the horse and asked him if he didn't want to ride. He looked at me steadily for a minute, and I stammered out:

"It's pretty warm to walk, Jack—and it's very lonesome riding alone.'

"'All right,' said he, and climbed in.

"It didn't take us very long to make up, you may believe. After that he used to come often and see us and would help us with our books, for we were trying to study when we had time.

"When the school term ended Joe worked on the farm again. Miss Ward was to be married in the autumn, and although the trustees urged her to remain, she was obliged to give up her position. So our parents decided that we had better go to the academy at Kingsport.

"When we came to take our entrance examination we found out how much we had lost by our strike. While the rest of us had to join the class in elementary Latin, Jack went into an advanced class; and that's the reason he's a year ahead of Rob, Harry and me in college.

"After the fall work was done Joe went back to school, and continued there, working at home nights and mornings until the spring work began on the farm. Father encouraged him to go ahead, and the next fall offered to send him to the Kingsport academy for two years. Joe accepted the offer, and did some very good work at the academy. He isn't exactly brilliant, and would never be likely to carry off many honors for scholarship, but what he does, he does well.

"When the two years were over he decided to become a mechanic, and got a place in the factory at Kingsport. He has been promoted once or twice already, and a short time ago a member of the firm told father that he was one of the best men they had. He did not give up trying to learn when he left school; he studies the structure and uses of materials and machinery as closely and patiently as he did his books. The firm means to promote him as fast as he shows himself capable.

"Joe insisted on repaying to father the amount of all his expenses while he was in school. He is devoted to all of us, and always declares that if Rob and I had not gone on a strike that summer he would never have been where he is."

"So your strike," said I, "did some good after all?"

"Yes—to Joe," said Ned. "But it left us one class behind in college. It gave us a very good lesson, to be sure, and hardened our muscles; but that was because father was wise enough to turn our folly to our own advantage."—Glenn Holley, in Youth's Companion.

The Pure Yankee Drawl.

The slab-sided Yankee and the Yankee drawl are popular delusions. That is to say, slab sides and drawling are less prevalent in Yankeedom than in some other places—they are not distinctively Yankee productions. "Caow" and "haow" and the like may be heard more or less in every town in Vermont, but the pronunciation is not the rule and is most noticeable among illiterate people. So in all New England. But if any one will go down the coast and cross the Hudson River, he may hear that drawl with such abominations as are never approached in Yankee land, and that among all classes of people. He will find it strong in New Jersey, faint and rare in the Philadelphia region, where the Dutch seem to have given a kind of broadbrogue to all mankind, but strong again southward to Virginia, where the people are of English stock. No doubt the "caow" pronunciation was brought over from England with other things good and bad, and planted wherever colonies were established. The drawl is an offensive thing—a barbarous thing, as reckoned in New England—but it now really belongs less to Yankeeland than to some other sections.

WOMEN AND THE WAR.

Their Activity Then Demonstrated the Possession of Faculties Not Dreamed Of.

In her article on "Cooperative Womanhood in the State" in the North American Review Mrs. Mary A. Livermore says that the Sanitary Commission was the first example of cooperative womanhood serving the State the world had ever witnessed, and as an education it was of incalculable value to women and to the Nation. While they were working for the relief of the army women studied the policy of the government and learned what tremendous issues were at stake—the questions involved in the war and the immediate causes underlying it. They maintained a sturdy devotion to the national cause, lightened the gloom of every reverse, were undismayed by the discouragements of an embarrassed trade and commerce, which brought faintness to the hearts of men, and stoutly rebuked the manifestation of a disaffected, compromising and unpatriotic spirit. All the while they maintained a prodigious, correspondence with the soldiers in the army, 'thus keeping the men in the field civilians," says Dr. Bellows, "making the people at home, of both sexes, half soldiers." Not only did these woman broaden in their views; they grew practical and executive in work. They learned how to cooperate intelligently with men; became expert in conducting public business, in calling and presiding over public meetings, even when men made a large part of the audience; learned how to draft constitutions and by-laws, to act as secretaries and committees; how to keep accounts with precision and system; how to answer, indorse, and file letters; how to sort their stores and keep an accurate account of stock; they attended meetings with regularity and promptness, and became punctilious in observance of official etiquette in short they developed rapidly a remarkable aptitude for business, on which men looked and wondered. "Where were these superior women before the war?" was frequently asked. Above all, they learned one another, and found the world grown suddenly large for them, as they found friendships with women from whom they had long held aloft because of local sectarian, or personal jealousies and detractions. They had demonstrated the power of associated womanhood when working harmoniously, and had awakened men to a consciousness that there were in women possibilities and potencies of which they had never dreamed. The lesson has not been forgotten. The young women of that day are the middle-aged women of the present time, better educated than mothers, more self-poised, and instinct with vital interest in all that concerns the human race. The girls born during that period are our young women; who are coming on the stage better equipped for the work of life and with larger opportunities awaiting them than ever before dawned on a woman's vision.

THE HAWAIIANS' "POI."

They Eat It With Their Fingers and Catch It on the Fly.

In an article on the Sandwich Islands a writer in Frank Leslie's Popular Monthly says:

We saw the natives eating "poi." Poi is something like cornstarch and is made from the "taro," the Hawaiian potato, which is first mashed into a kind of flour and then cooked until it is a thick paste. Their manner of eating it is peculiar, and I will describe it as I saw it.

Four or five persons, natives, were seated on the forward deck around an open earthen jar containing this poi. Putting their two forefingers together, they would dip them into this jar; a little twist of the wrist would collect a fair mouthful, which was lifted rapidly to the mouth—no dripping allowed;—the fingers were licked clean, and then they were ready for another "go."

It doesn't look pretty, and as it is customary for several to eat from the same dish it rather went against my American prejudice. If I was very much in love, and "she" had very pretty fingers and was very particular about her hands, I might be willing to eat poi with her.

Married by Typewriter.

I have often sung the praises of the typewriter, but its last act of beneficence has astonished even its most ardent admirers. Two deaf mutes in Indiana had exchanged vows, presumably on the tips of their fingers, which were nevertheless not formed for caligraphy; they were bad writers, and the clergyman who was to unite them was unacquainted with the deaf and dumb alphabet. How, then were the interrogation of the marriage service to be duly administered-Happy thought! the type-writer!—a machine that is familiar to every hand in the Great Republic. It was carried to the altar and manipulated by the silent pair under ecclesiastical direction but without a clerical error. As divorce is common in the locality, duplicates were thoughtfully taken for both bride and bridegroom—a delicate and graceful blinking of the fact that not a word of disagreement could ever pass between them.

Dairy Dots.

A dairyman who thought his cow did not pay for her feed, put her in a stall and began feeding her for the butcher, says an exchange. He kept on milking her because he did not like to lose the little milk she gave. Very soon the cow improved so much in milk that he gave her more feed, and in return she gave more milk, and so the cow kept on until before she was fat enough to kill, she had made more butter than her meat would have been worth. There are a good many cows of this kind if their owners only knew it.

A WORLD-WONDERFUL OFFER.

The Weekly Pioneer Press, for one Year, and the Revised Encyclopedia Britannica for $7.50.

By a fortunate arrangement with the publishers of the Revised Encyclopedia Britannica, the Pioneer Press is enabled to make an offer which twelve months ago would have been regarded as impossible, not to say ridiculous.

Any one, parent or child, teacher or pupil, employer or employe, sending to the Pioneer Press Company, St. Paul, Minn., $7.50 will receive in return, and absolutely free of all delivery charges, the Weekly Pioneer Press for one year and a complete set of the Revised Encyclopedia Britannica.

This magnificent work is comprised in twenty octavo volumes of seven thousand pages, fourteen thousand columns and eight million words, and has ninety-six maps, printed in colors. It is most emphatically "up to date" in all relating to art, literature and science, and has four thousand biographies of dead or living celebrities. It is the most complete dictionary of America extant and contains all the information of the Encyclopedia Britannica and hundreds of additional facts. It is preeminently modern and peculiarly correct.

No such offer was ever made by a newspaper before. No such offer could have been made one month ago. The twenty volumes are bound in heavy jute manilla; the paper of the printed pages is excellent, and the type, maps and illustrations are the same as used in the sheep, Russian or calf-skin bound editions.

Present subscribers to the Weekly Pioneer Press by sending $7.50 will receive the Encyclopedia as described above and will have their paper continued one year from the expiration of their present subscription.

No charge for delivery. You can send your distant friend the Weekly and the twenty volumes for $7.50

Poultry for Profit.

Are you keeping poultry for profit, either in large or small numbers? No matter if you keep only a dozen hens; are they paying you a profit over and above their keep and eggs and poultry used in your own family? If not, can you explain why not? For poultry properly kept pays the best of any domestic animals. Do you care to learn how a man of experience does make his hens pay better than $2.50 per year for each hen, from eggs alone; and who has to buy all of his grain and meat food? Do you desire to know how to make hens lay the most eggs in a year; how to dress and sell poultry and eggs to obtain the highest price? Do you care to learn about, and how to obtain the best breeds and crosses from which to get the largest number of eggs and most pounds of poultry to sell? And when and where to sell them? Do you desire to know how to prevent and treat diseases of poultry; how to get your hens through the moulting season well and strong; how to bring your pullets to early laying, etc.? Do you care to learn how to build the best poultry houses and yards economically, warm and dry? In short, do you desire to know how to make money with a few hens? If so, for the small sum of fifty cents you can learn all of the above and much more. Subscribe for one year to the FARM-POULTRY, if for no longer. Sample copy will be sent free. A MAD POET rushed into a newspaper office recently, and threatened to "clean out" the establishment, because they printed his verses wrong. Said he: "I wrote, 'To dwell forever in a grot of peace,' and you idiots put it 'a pot of grease.'" The mortified editor presented him with a vial of Dr. Pierce's Pleasant Pellets, a year's subscription and an apology.

The little "Pellets" positively cure sick and nervous headache, biliousness, costiveness, and all derangements of the stomach, bowels and liver. It's a large contract, but the smallest things in the world do the business—Dr. Pierce's Pleasant Pellets. They're the smallest, but the most effective. They go to work in the right way. They cleanse and renovate the liver, stomach and bowels thoroughly—but they do it mildly and gently. You feel the good they do—but you don't feel them doing it.

They're the cheapest pill you can buy, because they're guaranteed to give satisfaction, or your money is returned. You only pay for the good you get.

That's the peculiar plan all Dr. Pierce's medicines are sold on, through druggists.

"August Flower"

I had been troubled five months with Dyspepsia. The doctors told me it was chronic. I had a fullness after eating and a heavy load in the pit of my stomach. I suffered frequently from a Water Brash of clear matter. Sometimes a deathly Sickness at the Stomach would overtake me. Then again I would have the terrible pains of Wind Colic. At such times I would try to belch and could not. I was working then for Thomas McHenry, Druggist, Cor. Irwin and Western Ave., Allegheny City, Pa., in whose employ I had been for seven years. Finally I used August Flower, and after using just one bottle for two weeks, was entirely relieved of all the trouble. I can now eat things I dared not touch before. I would like to refer you to Mr. McHenry, for whom I worked, who knows all about my condition, and from whom I bought the medicine. I live with my wife and family at 39 James St., Allegheny City, Pa. A commercial center is the safest place to invest in real estate, especially when such place is a great railway center, has great river transportation and large foreign and domestic shipping. Portland is that place.

Portland, Oregon, is now pre-eminently the commercial center of the Pacific Northwest. No other city in the United States is so well situated in respect to natural resources as is Portland, and it leads all other cities west of the Mississippi River in its phenomenal growth in population. Located at the confluence of two great rivers, and being the terminus of more transcontinental railways than any other city in the United States. In fact, every advantage which insures the solid growth and prosperity of a city is abundantly enjoyed by Portland.

These Advantages Guarantee Constantly Increasing Values in Real Estate.

THE FARM AND FIELD.

MATTERS TO INTEREST RURAL READERS.

About Plowing--Absorbent Power of Straw--Making the Most of It--Are Large Barns Best? --Does Dairying Pay.

About Plowing.

Whether it is best to plow deep or shallow is not one of the things "no fellow can find out," for experiment will generally show which is preferable. It would seem, on general principles, that deep plowing, with subsoiling, would yield the best results in every case, and scientists have usually so taught. But many farmers who have followed their advice has learned by sad experience that a good rule sometimes has important exceptions. For, as a matter of fact, it depends a good deal on the character of the soil and of the crop and of the season whether deep plowing is advantageous or not; and this scientists are beginning to find out, as well as practical farmers.

An interesting experiment is on record which throws much light on this subject. A farmer who had been accustomed to plow deeply, determined to try for a prize offered by the local agricultural society for the best half acre of corn; He manured his half acre heavily, turned up a nine-inch furrow, stirred the soil seven inches deeper with a subsoil plow, harrowed thoroughly, and thought he had an ideally prepared cornfield. The remainder of the field was manured heavily, plowed two inches deep and well harrowed. The corn started satisfactorily on both plots, and for the first month no difference between them was apparent. But then a severe drought set in, and at the end of July the shallowed-plowed field was far ahead. August proved dry, and at the close of the month the corn on the deeply plowed field was suffering severely, the leaves turning yellow, nearly up to the ears, while the other plot suffered but little. It grew rapidly and made the best crop of corn in the neighborhood, notwithstanding the fact that it was not hoed at all, while the well-prepared half acre, which did not yield over half as much, was hoed twice. Examination showed that the moisture had dried out to the bottom of the deeply plowed furrow, while in the bottom of the two-inch furrow moisture was plentiful. The surface soil thus treated, it should be added, was a light loam, quite rolling, with a subsoil of yellow clay, thirty feet deep, jointed and well adapted for draining.

It is hardly safe to generalize from a single experience, but this experiment, taken in connection with others, seems to support the plan often advocated of plowing deeply in the fall for spring crops, and thoroughly pulverizing the surface in the spring with the harrow. By trying the two systems side by side, as in the case above cited, farmers may easily learn which will yield the best results for them.

Are Large Barns Best?

There are some reasons why a large, roomy barn is better than two or more small ones. It is more convenient, ot course, to have everything—hay, grain, cattle, horses, wagons and farm tools—under one roof. But, on the other hand, there are scme advantages in having smaller barns.

In the first place, they need not be as expensive in construction as the large barn. Lighter timbers may be used and the cost of erection is much less. Then, in case of fire, which is more dreaded by the farmer than by another class in the community, owing to his isolated situation, the loss may by good management be confined to one building, leaving the others intact. This is a very important consideration. Most of the losses of horses and other livestock at fires are the result of suffocation by smoke, not by the fire itself. It is not wise to put all one's eggs in the same basket. If the material and livstock are in two or three or five buildings instead of one it is not probable that the fire will sweep all away before aid can be obtained.

It is also worth thinking of that the cost of insurance is usually greater on a large barn, and on the stock, grains, hay and implements stored in it than on a number of small barns in which these things are distributed.

For these and other reasons that might be named it seems advisable for all farmers of moderate means to build small barns. Men who have abundance of means can, of course, indulge themselves in such luxuries as large and expensive barns, with all the risks pertaining thereto; but even for them a series of smaller structures, wisely planned and placed, would be better.

Absorbent Power of Straw.

Some interesting experiments have been made to determine the absorbent power of wheat and other varieties of straw.

In one of these experiments small, compact bundles of wheat, rye, oat and pea straw were put to soak in water so as to be completely covered. After soaking for twenty-four hours they were taken from the water, set in an upwright position, and allowed to drain for half an hour. They were then left lying for an hour and a half, in order that the excess of water might drain off from them. They were then weighed and at intervals afterward during a period of forty-four hours.

The experiment showed that the wheat straw absorbed in the twenty-four hours 225.8 per cent. of water, the rye straw 241.4, the oat straw 213.6, the pea straw 280.9. In the forty-four hours they lost respectively 55, 67,7, and 40 and 92.2 per cent. of water leaving the per centage retained in each as follows: Wheat. 170.8; rye, 173.7; oat, 173.6; pea, 188.7.

A bundle of wheat straw left to soak for forty-eight hours took up nearly 22 per cent. more water, or 247.6 per cent. At the end of twenty-four hours 46.7 per cent was given off leaving 200.9 per cent of water after twenty-four hours' exposure to the air.

Does Dairying Pay.

Does dairying pay? What a question. If by pay you mean netting an income, it certainly will unless grossly mismanaged and neglected, but when you come to the amount of that income the question is instantly removed from the dairy to the man. Each owner of a dairy will succeed with it to the limit of his ability and he must govern his expenditures for family comforts by that ability. If he has not much enterprise or judgment then he must live very frugally, but if he is a young Napoleon in the dairy field then he and his family may spread themselves. There is an abundance of room in the dairy business for any sized genius, from the man who milks two cows and peddles his milk by hand and afoot, to the man who owns and runs twenty to thirty factories. When we come, though, to consider the paying part of it, in ten years you would probably find that the two cow man has more money than the man with thirty factories, at least such seems to have been the fate of such large enterprises. A little success in the dairy has its temptations like any other business to induce men to over crop themselves, while the man who starts on a small scale generally climbs to the top.—American Dairyman.

Making the Most of It.

There are some wiseacres who still maintain that it is easier and more profitable to grow two tons of hay on two acres than on one acre, or to raise forty bushels of corn on four acres than the same amount from one acre. It is safe to say that such persons keep no account with their farms. It is all guess work and theory. Practical experience has shown just the reverse. The land of which the most is made, on which the proverbial two blades of grass is grown where one grew before, has been proved to be by far the most economically worked, because the additional labor and fertilizing material put upon it cost a good deal less than required for the larger and less highly cultivated area. Such higher cultivation has become a necessity in these days of sharp competition. We heard a successful business man say recently that his business had to be run very close nowadays, the margin of profit was so small. The same thing is true in agriculture. Whatever can be saved in labor, wages and fertilizing material is needed to make ends meet and leave a little balance at the end of the year.

A Serious Mistake.

The old saying of the play of Hamlet with Hamlet omitted is being exemplified in the dairy every day. Here are thousands of dairymen all oyer the country setting milk in deep pails and selling the cream to factories and not using ice with those deep pails. If this is not omitting Hamlet then we don't know how it could be done. Deep cans are made for setting milk in water always below fifty degrees, aud it should be at least to forty-five; but if allowed to rise above fifty, then the loss may be all the way from ten to twenty-five per cent of the cream. The owners of factories should know these facts and so instruct their help for a double purpose, to save them from the loss and to get more and better cream at the factory. Now is the time to let them know about this so that they may build ice houses this fall in time to secure the ice crop.

Farm Notes.

The broken down mare will not foal tiptop colts, no matter how good the sire may be.

Ducks should always have dry quarters at night if they are to be kept thrifty and healthy.

It is useless to attempt to start a herd of thoroughbred stock on a foundation of dollar pigs.

Lack of gravel or gritty material is nearly always the cause of the fowls getting crop bound.

Lucky the man whose herd comes into fresh milking from now to Christmas. Winter dairying pays.

It is bad policy to milk a cow while she is eating. After a while she will not be disposed to stand to be milked unless she has something to eat.

Rheumatism is a prevalent disease in hogs during fall and early winter. Prevent it by giving them dry quarters. Some pens have dry floors, but wet filthy sloughs beneath them.

Store hogs keep in health with little trouble if they be given right quarters and conditions. This is easier than to doctor them because they get off their feed or are otherwise ailing.

For tape worms in hogs, give no food for 24-hours, then give half an ounce to an ounce of spirits of turpentine, according to the size of the animal. Dilate the dose with a half pint of milk, and give no food for 12 hourr following.

THE ART OF LEAVING.

Don't Linger Too Long Over Your Farewell.

Do cultivate the art of leaving promptly; even if you can't do it in an artistic way, learn to do it somehow.

Some people seem to be anchored in the parlor when they pay a call. To the flight of time and the near approach of her hostess's dinner hour this sort of caller pays no attention. Frequently she says, "Oh I must go," gets up, sits down again and goes on talking. Presently she again says that she must go, gets up and continues to talk. She gets into the hall, at length and talks there. Finally the anxious visitee, who hears the baby crying upstairs, gets the door open for her guest, who makes a supplementary call upon the door-step, exposing the other to pneumonia. At last she descends the steps, and the hostess precipitately retreats and shuts the door, for fear she will think of something else to come back and say.

The writer once heard of a woman who, considerably chagrined at the announcement of a visitor whom she knew had these staying powers just as she was preparing to keep an important engagement, decided to go into the parlor with her bonnet on and explain her hurry. She even arranged with her husband to come into the room and "remind" her at the end of a quarter of an hour.

The guest did not take a hint from the bonnet beyond saying that she would only stay a few minutes, but when the reminder came she exclaimed, "Oh, then I must go, of course," stood up and remained talking several minutes more, walked to the door and stopped again. At last Mrs. R., in desperation, suggested that they should walk along together as far as they could. The visitor agreed, but even at the corner where they parted she stood talking long enough for Mrs. R. to lose her train and her appointment.

Shy and nervous young people have the hardest time in leaving, and are more to be pitied than blamed. Their suffering is often great. They are impressed with the idea that the how is of more consequence than the what, and they keep trying and trying to lead the conversation up to what they think will be a graceful departure. They are wishing themselves away a great deal more desperately than any one else can. They watch for pauses in the conversation and clear their throats to introduce some variation upon Lemuel's "I guess I'd better be going," but they are never quick enough. Somebody else begins to speak, and they resign themselves with sinking hearts to waiting another ten minutes.

Still it is not always the caller's fault that she does not go. Sometimes it is the hostess who is the fluent person, who ends every sentence with a rising inflection, indicating that it is only suspended, and that she is going right on. In such case it may appear to the caller as if it would be rude to interrupt her, though she may have heard the muffled tiptoeing of the rest of the family past the parlor door and the subdued clatter of china from somewhere, and have a painful suspicion that dinner or tea is ready and they don't want to ring the bell.

But there is one golden rule at least that the caller may stick to. When you once get up to go never sit down again.

Hamlin's First Meeting With Lincoln.

Hannibal Hamlin never met Abraham Lincoln until the day after their nominations in May, 1860. The introduction took place in the old Tremont House in Chicago, and from the beginning the two candidates seemed mutually prepossessed with each other a feeling which developed afterward into a profound friendship, unshaken even by the political exigencies that made Andrew Johnson Lincoln's choice as running-mate when he made his second campaign. Mr. Hamlin used to tell with a glee the manner of receiving the news of his nomination. He was sitting in one of the rooms of the old Tremont playing euchre with a party of politicians. Suddenly the noise of many feet was heard in the corridor without. Such events were not unusual in a hotel filled with delegates, so the game was not interrupted. But just as a deal had been finished and the trump turned, Schuyler Colfax burst into the room, without stopping to rap at the door, and announced:

"Come, come, Hamlin, this is no place for you. You're nominated for Vice-Presinent and must come over and make a speech."

"So I went over to the hall and made them a little talk," Mr. Hamlin used to add pathetically; "but it spoiled the very best lone hand I ever held.—From the Chicago Herald.

A Watch as a Compass.

Many people do not know, or have forgotten, that in sunny weather the watch is capable of serving as a compass. It is presumed that the watch is correct, although an error of a few minutes will not matter much Hold it flat, dial up, and point the hour hand toward the sun. When the shadow of the hand falls directly beneath, it may be inferred that the hand is pointing in the desired direction. Now the point on the dial midway between the numeral XII. and the hour hand indicates the south point of the horizon. To illustrate: At 2 p. m. point the hour hand to the sun, which brings the numeral I. midway between the hour hand and the numeral XII. In this instance the numeral I. points south. At 4 o'clock the numeral II. points south, and so on. The experiment also applies to the morning hours.—Newark Standard.

A Splendid Herd of Elk.

Reader, what would you have given to have seen, as I have, a band of two hundred and fifty bull-elk all collected together on a beautiful piece of green grassy turf at an elevation of nine thousand feet? Here was a sight to make a man's nerves tingle. This was the largest band of bulls, by actual count, that I have ever seen, though my cousin and partner once saw, in the fall of the year, including bulls, cows, and calves, fifteen hundred. This was on the memorable occasion when the only elk ever killed by any of my men gave up his life, and we have all concluded that this particular elk was frightened to death, for though three men shot at him and each was confident he hit him, they always asserted afterward that no bullet mark could be found on him. —Scribner.

In its November number the Cosmopolitan will publish a series of letters written by Gen. W. T. Sherman to one of his young daughters, between the years 1859 and 1865 and covering most of the important events of the war of secession. These letters present graphic pictures of a great soldier amid some of the stirring scenes in which he was a giant figure, and in them the patriotic spirit of the Federal general is seen to have been most attractively tempered by a strong affection for the Southern people. The fraternal feeling which glows in these letters is in refreshing contrast to the sectional bitterness which characterized the period, and they will constitute an interesting and important contribution to the literature of the war.

PIONEER PRESS BUREAU OF CLAIMS.

Indian Depredation Claims.

Persons who have lost property from Indian raids should file their claims under the Indian Depredation Act of March 3, 1891. The time is limited, and the claims are taken up by the court in the order in which they are received.

TAKE NOTICE THAT ALL CONTRACTS ENTERED INTO WITH ATTORNEYS PRIOR TO THE ACT ARE MADE NULL AND VOID.

Information given and all claims promptly attended to.

Patents for Inventions.

Equal with the interest of those having claims against the Government is that of INVENTORS, who often lose the benefit of valuable inventions because of the incompetency or inattention of the attorneys employed to obtain their patents. Too much care cannot be exercised in employing competent and reliable solicitors to procure patents, for the value of a patent depends greatly, if not entirely, upon the care and skill of the attorney.

With the view of protecting inventors from worthless or careless attorneys, and of seeing that inventions are well protected by valid patents, the PIONEER PRESS BUREAU has retained counsel expert in patent practice, and is therefore prepared to Obtain patents,

Conduct interferences,
Make special examinations,
Prosecute rejected cases,
Register trade marks and copyrights,
Render opinions as to scope and validity of patents,
Prosecute and defend infringement suits, etc. etc.

If you have an invention on hand send THE PIONEER PRESS BUREAU a sketch or photograph thereof, together with a brief description of the important features, and you will be at once advised as to the best course to pursue. Models are not necessary unless the invention is of a complicated nature. If others are infringing on your rights, or if you are charged with infringement by others, submit the matter to THE BUREAU for a reliable OPINION before acting on the matter.

PENSIONS

Pensions procured for soldiers of the Rebellion who served 90 days and are NOW disabled from ANY cause. This pension is payable whether the disability way incurred before, during or since service. Pensions for widows and children without regard to cause of soldier's death. Pensions for mothers and fathers who are NOW dependent, whether they were dependent on soldier when he died or not. Widows, children and parents are regarded as "dependent" in all cases where they have not sufficient income from property for their support.

Soldiers pensioned at less than twelve ($12.00) dollars per month and suffering from disability in addition to that named in their pension certificate, may obtain increase under the new law.

Information and advice given without charge. Best facilities ever offered to claimants to have their claims properly and diligently prosecuted. No charges unless successful. Write for information.

And a good lamp must be simple; when it is not simple it is not good. Simple, Beautiful, Good—these words mean much, but to see "The Rochester" will impress the truth more forcibly. All metal, tough and seamless, and made in three pieces only, it is absolutely safe and unbreakable. Like Aladdin's of old, it is indeed a "wonderful lamp," for its marvelous light is purer and brighter than gas light, softer than electric light and more cheerful than either.

Caution!—There have recently been issued several cheap reprints of the 1847 edition of Webster's Unabridged Dictionary, an edition long since superannuated. These books are given various names,—"Webster's Unabridged," "The Great Webster's Dictionary," "Webster's Big Dictionary," "Webster's Encyclopedic Dictionary," etc., etc.

Many announcements concerning them are very misleading, as the body of each, from A to Z, is 44 years old, and printed from cheap plates made by photographing the old pages.

Improved Passenger Service.

Under the new time schedule of "the North-Western Line," C., St. P., M. & O. Ry., all passenger trains of this line make the trip between St. Paul and Chicago in less than 14 hours.

The Pullman and Wagner Vestibuled Limited, leaving St. Paul at 7:30 p. m. makes the trip to Chicago, in 13½ hours and from Chicago to St. Paul in 13 hours and 25 minutes.

The Daylight Express leaving St Paul at 7:45 a. m. makes the trip to Chicago in 13 hours and 50 minutes and from Chicago to St. Paul in 13 hours and 45 minutes.

This is the only line running all its trains in less than 14 hour between St. Paul and Chicago; and while this time is quick trains don't have to run at as high speed to make their time as on other lines, because this is shorter than any other line.

In addition to these facts this is the only line by which connections are assure in Chicago with all fast line trains from Chicag to the East and South in the morning and at night.

Note.—Fares by this line are always as low as by any other.

Consumption Cured.

An old physician, retired from practice having had placed in his hands by an East India missionary the formula of a simple vegetable remedy for the speedy and permanent cure of Consumption, Bronchitis, Catarrh, Asthma and all throat and Lung Affections, also a positive and radical cure for Nervous Debility and all Nervous Complaints, after having tested its wonderful curative powers in thousands of cases, has felt it his duty to make it known to his suffering fellows. Actuated by this motive and desire to relieve human suffering I will send, free of charge, to all who desire it, this recipe in German French or English, with full directions for preparing and using. State of Minnesota, county of Polk—ss.

In probate court, special term, Sept. 28th, 1891.

In the matter of the estate of Amanda C. Watson, deceased.

Letters testamentary on the estate of said deceased being this day granted unto John Watson of said county, it is ordered that all claims and demands of all persons against said estate be presented to this court, for examination and allowance, at the probate office in the city of Crookston on the first Monday in March, 1892, at 10 o'clock in the fornoon.

It is further ordered, that six months from the date hereof be allowed to creditors to present their claims against said estate, at the expiration of which time all claims not presented to said court or not proven to its satisfaction, shall be forever barred, unless for cause shown further time be allowed.

Ordered further, that notice of the time and place of the hearing and examination of said claims and demands shall be given by publishing this order once in each week for three successive weeks prior to the day appointed for such examination, in the Red Lake Falls News, a weekly newspaper printed and published at Red Lake Falls, in said county.

Dated at Crookston the 28th day of Sept. D. 1891.

By the Court, C. M. BRANSON, Judge of Probate.

Mortgage Foreclosure Sale.

Default having been made in the payment of the money secured by a certain mortgage, duly executed and delivered by Silvester Johnson and Julia Johnson, his wife, of Polk county, Minnesota, mortgagors, to Francis W. Noyes, mortgagee, bearing date the 7th day of July 1882, and, with a power of sale therein contained duly recorded in the office of the register of deeds in and for the county of Polk and state of Minnesota, on the [illegible] day of July, 1882, at 11:10 o'clock a. m., in book F of mortgages on pages 592 to [illegible] and no action or proceeding having been instituted, at law or otherwise, to recover the debt secured by said mortgage, or any part thereof. The amount claimed to be due upon said mortgage at the date hereof is the sum of four hundred and [illegible] seven dollars ([illegible]) besides the sum of one hundred three and 35-100 dollars for taxes necessarily paid by said mortgagee and interest, and twenty five dollars, attorney's fees, stipulated for in said mortgage.

Now, therefore, notice is hereby given, that the said mortgage will be foreclosed by a sale of the premises described in said mortgage, viz:

The east half of the southeast quarter and the east half of the north east quarter of section number thirty two in township No. one hundred and forty [illegible] of range forty-five west and containing one hundred and sixty acres of land more or less, according to the government survey thereof in Polk county, and state of Minnesota, which sale will be made by the sheriff of said Polk county, or his deputy, at the front door of the court house, in the city of Crookston in said county and state, on the [illegible] day of November, 1891, at 2 o'clock p.m., of that day.

Dated October 1st, A. D. 1891.

Francis W. Noyes, Mortgagee.

E. P. PIERCE, Attorney, Crookston, Minn. (oc8n19)

Mortgage Foreclosure Sale.

Default having been made in the payment of the money secured by a certain mortgage, duly executed and delivered by Edwin T Bigelow of Polk County, Minnesota, mortgagor, to William Plankinton, mortgagee, bearing date the 21st day of January, 1884, and, with a power of sale therein contained, duly recorded in the office of the register of deeds in and for the county of Polk and state of Minnesota, on the 21st day of January, 1884, at 2:15 o'clock p. m., in book O of mortgages, on page 575 to 576, and no action or proceeding having been instituted, at law or otherwise, to recover the debt secured by said mortgage, or any part thereof. The amount claimed to be due upon said mortgage at the date hereof is the sum of eight hundred seventeen dollars and fifty cents, ($817 and 50-100 dollars) besides the sum of seventy-two and 93-100 dollars for taxes necessarily paid by said mortgagee and interest, and fifty dollars, attorney's fees, stipulated for in said mortgage.

Now, therefore, notice is hereby given, that the said mortgage will be foreclosed by a sale of the premises described in said mortgage, viz: The south east quarter of section thirty two in township one hundred and fiftyfour north of range forty seven west containing one hundred and sixty acres of land more or less in Polk county and state of Minnesota, which sale will be made by the sheriff of said Polk county, or his deputy, at the front door of the court house, in the city of Crookston in said county and state, on the 31st day of November, 1891, at 2 o'clock p.m. of that day.

Dated Sept, 1st, A. D. 1891.

WILLIAM PLANKINTON, Mortgagee.

Visitors' Day.

Tuesday, Oct. 20th, is designated as "visitor's day" for the purpose of witnessing the rendition of "The Rebellion," the grand, military, allegorical drama, in five acts, which is to be given at the Grand Opera House in Crookston on the evenings of Oct. 19th, 20th and 21st, for the benefit of the Crookston Militia company which has just organized. The drama will be given complete each evening.. Those who have a desire to be present can have the best seats in the different sections reserved by addressing the manager. W. L. Palmer, or Capt. P. J. Russell, when tickets will either be forwarded by mail or placed in a sealed envelope and left in the box office of the theatre where they can be obtained upon arrival. The Rebellion is rendered entirely by Crookston people. The battle scene at the end of the second act it is claimed will be the most realistic thing of the character ever attempted outside of the large cities. There will be the long roll; the piquet firing; the distant roar of artillery; the shriek and bursting of shrapnel; the withering volleys of musketry; the charge and capture of the battery; the dead and wounded; the grand rally and final overthrow of the enemy. In this scene a ten pound Parrot rifle cannon will be used.

A Legislative Endorsement.

A law was passed last winter in Minnesota affecting sale of alum baking powders. The interest excited by the bill when proposed led to a long and thorough investigation by a legislative committee of the qualities of all the baking powders sold in that State with the result that the Royal was shown by very positive evidence form the State Chemist, Dr. Drew and others, to be the purest, strongest, and in all respects best baking powder in the market.

The Discovery of America.

Three hundred and ninety-nine years ago this week Christopher Columbus came in sight of the Western hemispher. To be exact, it was three hundered and nienty-nine years the 14th day of the preset month. Familiar as it is to every child at school, and commonplace as the mention of it seems now to be it is really one of those wonderful events in history of our world which seem like romance when we come to learn the particulars, the history. Dying in poverty and neglect, the Genoese stepped from a troubled life to a place among immortal names. If his spirit is cognizant of what takes place on earth, it must be proud to know that all the great nations will soon send their representatives to the land he discoved, to do honor to his achievements. To that celebration the World's Fair at Chicago, the whole Northwest desires to go, and when choosing a railroad route they will make no mistake if they take "The Burlington it reaches many prominent cities besides Chicago and to ascertain rates of fare, connecting, etc call on any ticket agent of this or connecting or write to W. Sheep Notes.

Keep the feet of your sheep clean.

See that sheep have plenty of water.

Sheep on short pasture need extra feed as much as other animals.

Guard against sudden changes of weather and especially hard storms of rain or snow.

Under neglect or unfavorable conditions sheep deteriorate as any other animals do.

Good sheep are the product of the highest agriculture and thrive only with good care and suitable natural conditions.

Because sheep will drink dirty, stagnant water, is there any reason why they would not prefer clear, pure water if they could get it?

You must not believe what anyone says about his dog not worrying sheep. Your dog will do it if he gets the chance.—Maryland Farmer.

The quality of the wool you sell dominates the prices received, and good wool will not grow on starvation rations any more than good meat.

The wool and manure pay for the keep of a sheep, as many flockmasters attest, and the lambs are all profit. What other class of live stock will show as large a per cent of profit? Every farmer can keep 10 sheep, and most of them from 50 to 100.

Whener sheep husbandry in the United States reaches that point where carcass will govern the sheep and establish its value more than the fleece, the business will be on a safer and more satisfactory basis.

Coal.

Next week you will find coal for domestic use—the finest quality—at the yard of P & J Meehan on Main st.

Smithing Coal.

Of the best grade may be obtained at the Main st yard.

A Good One.

One thousand dollars will be paid by THE QUEEN to the lady or gentlemen, girl boy, forming the largest list of English words (of not less than four letters) from the letters contained in "Queen Souvenir Spoon." Five hundered dollars will be paid to the one sending the second largest list and one hundered adpitional good prizes given in order of merit. A Very Narrow Escape.

Yes, I had a very narrow escape, said a prominent citizen to a friend. I was confined to my bed for more than two years and all my friends gave me up. I had running sores on my limbs and after using nearly everything was induced to try Metzger's Pain Eradicator and now here I am, sound and hearty. You will find it for sale by W. A. Schreiter. Price 50c a bottle, trial size free.

A Remarkable Good Man.

He who attends to the comfort of his family and will not suffer himself or allow them to, with that most dreadful of pains, rheumatism. Metzger's Angle and Wormwood oil Liniment is a positive cure for rheumatism and sprains. It is the best external application on earth. One bottle is better than any amount of porous plaster. Price 50 cents per bottle. For sale by W. A. Schreiter.

A Destructive Storm.

W. M. Dreary, of the firm of Taylor & Dreary, made a trip through the district struck by a cyclone or tornado about tw weeks ago, and reports the damage as much greater than reported. "The cyclone," he said, "started on the Red Lake reservation about ten miles from Rainy river and pursued a southeastern course, ending near Swan Lake. It fairly mowed down the timber on a strip from three to fourteen miles in width and sixty miles in length. Trees three feet in thickness were snapped off near the ground. The state lost considerable timber, but the government much more, on land unsurveyed. Private parties, too, lost a little. It was the worst blow down I had ever seen. There were many homesteaders squatting on this unsurveyed government land who packed up their belongings and left, considering that the timber had been as good as destroyed." In speaking of the reports that are frequently heard in regard to timber stealing in the Rainy River country, Mr. D. said, they were much exaggerated. The government may have lost a little timber in this way but it was confined almost entirely to that standing conveniently near Rainy river.

The Rebellion.

"The Rebellion," the great military drama, in five acts, will be placed upon the stage of the Grand Opera House at Crookston on the 19th, 20th, 21st of this month, for the benefit of the militia company which was recently organized there. The cast is composed entirely of citizens of that city, among whom may be mentioned Judge Montague, Wm. Marin, Capt. Russell, Prof. Knudson, Maj. Mix, Zarracher, Prof. V. D. Carruth, Maj Stansbury, P. P. Bodine, besides the entire force of the militia company; seventeen ladies will also appear in speaking parts and tableaux. W. L. Palmer, formerly editor of the Daily Chronicle of that city, is the author and manager. The play was never before placed on the boards, in its present form, and it is the grandest militaray drama ever written of the war of the rebellion. Tuesday, Oct. 20th has been designated as "visitors' d y" and special rates will be given on the Great Northern and Northean Pacific roads on that date. Popular prices will prevail, viz: Parquet, 75c; dress circle 50c; balcony, 35c and 25c. Write for ticket to the manager and they will be forwarded to you for Oct. 20th.

His Curiosity Was Gratified.

A stranger stood alone in the street of a great city. His hat was napless his boots covered with the dust of travel. Around him on every side a hurrying throng pushed and jostled in mad heste. He turned to a friendly policeman and said: "Say: Where be all these people gwine"! The officer was dumfounded at such ignorance Where are they going? Why, to purchase tickets via the popular Wiscontin Central If you are going anywhere you want to go with the crowd and ride on the best track in the most comfortable cars and with the greatest ease you ever experienced". BEFORE DAWN.

The round luster of the white-faced moon
Makes wan the filaments of scattered cloud;
The stars tremble; Venus no more proud,
Pales westward, for the dawn comes soon.

The heavens are peopled with inchoate forms,
Mystic, fancy-clad, uncertain, swift,
Flying silent o'er each star-sown rift,
And vanishing as fast as summer storms.

The lissome branches flaunt against the sky
As if some wood-witch orgy were in course;
Aye, Pan is singing, ribald-voiced and hoarse,
Beneath the gloom away from human eye.

Oh, could I see the horn'd and curly god,
Then I should see the wood nymphs slim and fair,
Who dance upon the finger-tips of air,
And flash their beauty at its cynic nod.

Perchance some dryad, deep-eyed, round and sweet,
Would deem a mortal worthy of her wiles;
Ah me, she would not bare herself of smiles
Before I laid my heart beneath her feet.

But no; the east is silvered low and high;
There is no dance, there is no god nor maid;
The boughs are prim, the wood is cold and staid;
There are no shapes against the morning sky.

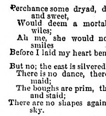
THE EMERALD EARRINGS.



THEY lay on their white velvet bed, the sunlight glittering through them, and changing their deep, rich green, that reminded me of mossy woodland nooks, into globules of golden light. A pair of emerald earrings, exquisitively set, and the handsomest I had ever seen. I was somewhat of a judge, too, for in bygone days, when fortune smiled on me, many rare gems found a place in my jewel casket.

But those days were a part of the irrevocable, past, and instead of living a gay life in a stately home, with an indulgent father to gratify every wish, I Mildred Heath, was now a hard-working little teacher in a crowded city school. A stuffy little room, third floor back, in Mrs. Wilson's shabby boarding-house, I called "home." No one knew how I longed for some of the old pleasures to help brighten the dull days that were now filled with monotonous labor; how I envied gay young girls as they rolled by in their carriages, laughing and chatting; or how the florists' windows tempted me with their wealth of beautiful blossoms, bringing to my mind so vividly the fragrant conservatories at my dear old home.

But after months of such useless repinings I had forced myself into a more contented frame of mind, and was at peace with myself and the world, until one unlucky day, in hastening through a side street to reach home before a threatened storm, I suddenly stopped before a dingy pawnbroker's window, where, surrounded by odds and ends of all sorts, reposed the emerald earrings described in the beginning of my story. How they lighted up that dull window with their soft, shimmering radiance! And at the first sight there came to me an overwhelming desire to possess them. All the restrained longing for that which was dainty, bright and beautiful, broke forth afresh; and not until the fast falling drops of rain reminded me that I was still some distance from home did I turn away from the window.

That night I dreamed I was teaching school in Africa, and the natives were pelting me with huge emeralds.

The next morning I again turned into the little street to feast my eyes on the beauty of those jewels. The following day, before starting for school, I counted over my little hoard of savings. Twenty-five dollars.

"Oh, dear! that will never buy them," I said dejectedly.

Nevertheless, I tucked the money into my purse and hastened to school. Not until evening did I find myself free, and then I fairly flew into that little side street, holding my breath as I drew near the pawnbroker's window, for fear the white velvet case and its contents would be missing. But no they were still there, looking if possible more beautiful than ever. And proving myself no exception to the old adage, "She who hesitates is lost," I quickly entered the shop and asked to see the earrings.

The proprietor, a greasy, unprepossessing looking individual, placed them before me, expatiating on their beauty in his smooth oily way.

"What is the price of these?" I asked breaking in on his volubility.

"Thirty-five dollars and they are cheap at that, miss."

"Yes, I know; but that is more than I can pay," I said falteringly, and scarcely able to restrain my tears, I turned slowly away.

"Wait a bit, miss," he called after me. "Now what will you give me for the lovely gems?"

"I have just twenty-five dollars," I said, "and I really ought not to spend so much for jewelry."

"But it is a great bargain," he said hastily, and as he saw me put away my purse he added: "Well, you take the emeralds and I'll take the $25. It is giving them away, really, but I have not the customers in this quiet street who would appreciate them," he added in suave tones.

Eagerly I counted out the money, and slipping the case into my pocket hurried home. Had I not been so delighted at getting my heart's desire I might have thought it strange that the pawnbroker was so ready to part with the jewels for so much less than their value. But no such thoughts troubled me. That night I slept with the jewels beneath my pillow, and actually arose in the night and lighted the gas to look at them. All of which was very childish, I know.

The next day was Saturday, and I had promised myself a treat—that of attending the flower show in progress at Horticultural Hall. So by 9 o'clock I was on my way, attired in my best gown and hat, with the emeralds swinging bravely in my ears.

It was a beautiful morning. The sun shone brightly, the park seemed full of twittering birds as I passed through it, and the grass looked fresh and green from the soft spring rains. I was in excellent spirits at the prospect of spending a day among the flowers, of which I was passionately fond, with no stupid children to correct and no dull lessons to hear.

On reaching the hall I almost screamed with delight for it looked like an enchanted palace, the work of fairies instead of man. For hours I wandered through isles carpeted with soft moss, banked by pyramids of flowers reaching to the roof. Here were carnations of every hue, their spicy aroma filling the air. There the graceful heliotrope nodded to her dainty neighbor, the lily of the valley, while the callas, drawn up like soldiers on guard, were surrounded by delicate, waving fern. And over it all floated the fragrance of roses.

During my walk among the flowers I had several times encountered a stout, elderly lady, richly dressed, accompanied by a very handsome young man who called her "aunt," and whose blue eyes looked into mine so earnestly each time he passed that I turned away blushing. Presently I found myself close behind them. I had stopped to examine a large cactus, and they had evidently halted for the same purpose, the lady lifted her arm to point toward the plant, and I was admiring the long, beautiful fringe on her mantle, when the crowd surging, pushed me against her, and it became entangled about one of my earrings. The owner of the fringe, perfectly unconscious hurried on to join her handsome nephew, who was a little in advance, while I, much against my will was obliged to keep pace with her.

The absurdity of the situation forced itself upon me, and I trembled with suppressed laughter. There I was being led along like "a lamb to the slaughter," vainly endeavoring to free myself without attracting attention and without injuring my precious ear-ring. Had there not been a young man in the case I should have spoken, but I had no desire for that particular one to see me in such a ridiculous position. But, alas! it was to be. In despair I gave a frantic tug at the fringe, that seemed to possess the strength of a cable. It parted so suddenly that my clenched hand struck the broad back before me with such a resounding whack that the old lady was rendered quite speechless for a moment.

"What in the world do you mean, young woman?" she finally grasped, irately.

"I—your fringe—my earring," I stammered, turning scarlet as I saw those blue eyes again looking into mine.

"Did it hurt you or injure your earring?" he asked kindly, as if he pitied my embarrassment.

"That is not the thing," the old lady ejaculated crossly, before I had time to answer. "My fringe is quite ruined; several strands are gone. Ah! it is caught on your miserable earring, that did all this mischief," she said tartly, stepping up to me to loosen it.

Then she dropped her hands with a little shriek, and clutched me tightly by the arm.

"Gilbert, look!" she cried excitedly. "My emeralds, my stolen emeralds! Ah, you wicked creature!"

"Hush! aunt," her nephew said in a low tone. "That girl is not a thief, and there is more than one pair of earrings in the world."

"There is not another pair like mine," she said decidedly, looking scornfully at me."

It had all taken place so suddenly that I stood like one dumb; but now I cried out passionately:

"I did not steal them—I bought them only last night."

The old lady sniffed contemptuously, and glanced suspiciously at my well-worn black gown; but her nephew said gently:

"I believe you, and regret that my aunt is so severe; Will you not come with us to a more private place and tell us about it?"

He courteously offered me his arm, but I proudly declined it, and walked by his side with head erect and burning cheeks. I, Mildred Heath, accused of stealing! We entered a room at the end of the long hall used as an office but now quite deserted; and without further ado I began tremulously—for a lump would come into my throat:

"My name is Mildred Heath, and I am a school-teacher. I saw the emeralds in a pawnbroker's window, and, although it was a foolish thing to do, I admired them so much that I bought them."

I handed the jewels to their owner, but her nephew interposed.

"Keep them just one moment, Miss Heath; I am very glad to hear your explanation, and beg that you will pardon my aunt's hasty words. Now I think an explanation is due you. My aunt, Mrs. Radcliffe, had a valuable pair of emerald ear-rings taken from her hall table, where she had carelessly left them. The front door stood open at the time. We had never been able to trace the jewels; these may or may not be hers. Will you kindly look on the rim of the setting and see if there is engraved there the letter 'R'?

I looked at the setting closely, and there, so small that the naked eye could scarcely see it, was the letter.

"Yes," I said, "the earrings are undoubtedly Mrs. Radcliffe's," and I gave them to her, when she was as profuse in her apologies as she had been in her accusations.

"I have a favor to ask of you, Miss Heath," Gilbert Radcliffe said. "Our carriage is at the door, and I should like you to take us to the pawnbroker from whom you purchased these earrings. Through him we may locate the thief."

We drove quickly there. On entering the dingy shop we saw a young woman eagerly displaying something to the proprietor. Seeing us she concealed the article, and, pulling down her veil, was about to make a hasty exit when Gilbert Radcliffe caught her by the arm, saying quietly:

"What have you in your pocket, Mary?"

The girl hesitated, then, bursting into tears, handed him a case containing several pieces of jewelry, the property of his aunt. Mary was Mrs. Radcliffe's maid. The pawnbroker being her brother she had no trouble in disposing of her stolen goods. So this explained the disappearance of the emeralds.

* * * * * *

As I write the earrings gleam brightly on me from my toilet-table, for I am now Mrs. Gilbert Radcliffe, and they were one of Mrs. Radcliffe's gifts on my wedding day—a gift I did not want to accept at first, they brought back so vividly that first unhappy day. But when Gilbert reminded me that but for them we might never have met I became reconciled to their possesion, and the place of honor in my jewel case is filled by the emerald earrings.—Elno Parr, in Waverly.

To Make Grape Wine.

Now that grapes are so cheap and plenty, the housekeeper who has storeroom for it may easily supply herself with an excellent light table wine. Buy your grapes in a quantity, say twenty pounds at once; pick from the stems, throwing out all imperfect ones; mash thoroughly, without crushing the seeds, and put into a large earthen or wooden vessel. For every gallon of mashed grapes add two of boiling water. Let it stand twenty-four hours; then strain and add to each gallon of liquor two to three and one-half pounds of granulated sugar. Stir with a wooden spoon till the sugar dissolves, then cover lightly— a thin cloth is best— and let it stand six weeks in a moderately warm place. Draw it off carefully from the lees, wash out the vessel clean, put back the wine and leave it a month longer; then bottle and seal or put into stone jugs corking them well.

Do not fill the jar at first by at least six inches, or it will run over when fermentation is well under way. Two pounds of sugar to the gallon makes a wine very like claret; three and a half gives one very sweet and quite strong. Do not risk less sugar. Fermentation turns it first to alcohol, later to acetic acid. If there is not sugar enough there will not be enough alcohol to check fermentations in time. The result will be a vinegara liquid fit for nothing under the sun.

Some grapes will make wine without the addition of sugar. If you choose to experiment, press out the juice without water and see if it will float an egg so as to show the size of a quarter dollar. If it does the must will ferment into wine; if not it will go on to vinegar if you do not add sugar till the egg does float.

Prompt and Heroic.

All Australian boys are taught the neccessity of guarding against snake-bites. The treatment of such wounds is a necessary part of their education. One day two little fellows, 6 and 8 years old, went into the brush to play. The smaller one, chasing a rabbit into a hole, pushed in his hand, and brought it out quickly with a head of a venomous snake attached to the end of the fingers. "Quick, Charley!" he cried, putting his hand down on a stump. "Chop off my finger! The snake has bitten it." Charley, without a pause, lifted his axe and chopped, not only the damaged finger, but two of the others as well. Then the boy ran straight into town, over a mile distant, and sought a surgeon, who dipped the injured members in ammonia before dressing them. Imagine the pain of such a burning bath! A young Australian lady was walking along the street, when she saw a dirty and wretched-looking tramp to whose leg a venomous snake had affixed itself. After killing the reptile with her parasol, she borrowed his pen-knife cut the trousers away from the wound, and then cutting a cross upon the bite itself, applied her lips to it, and sucked the poison away. The tramp's life was saved, at the sacrifice, perhaps of some dainty scruples.—Youth's Companion.

He Was an American.

A thin, delicate-looking woman sat in a horse car one evening recently, and next her sat a native of the Queen's realm. The window behind the Briton was open and the cool wind blew in on the woman, making her shiver. At last she said, in a ladylike way:—

"Won't you be kind enough to close the window behind you, as it makes me cold?"

It would have hardly caused the man any inconvenience to grant this request, but he replied harshly:—

"I prefer it open; you Americans can't stand anything; you all seem to have consumption."

The other passengers in the car were astounded at his incivility, and there were many angry glances cast at the royal subject. Finally a gentleman rose on the opposite side of the car, and approaching the Englishman with about 220 pounds avoirdupois leaned over him and grasping the window slammed it down with vigor; then he remarked:—

"Now, my friend, if you think all Americans are afflicted with consumption you just raise that window again. I am an American."

The little woman blushed, the other passengers smiled, the American returned to his seat, and the Briton looked out of the window and thought.

THE AGRICULTURAL WORLD

INTERESTING SUBJECTS FOR THE INTELLIGENT FARMER.

Something About Artificial Fertilizers--Points of a Good Dairy Cow--Red Water--Land too Rich for Strawberries.

Something About Artificial Fertilizers.

The elements which generally give out first in cultivated soils are nitrogen, phosphoric acid and potash. When a soil begins to show signs of unproductiveness, the lack of one or all of these constituents is almost universally indicated.

Nitrogen is one of the essential elements of plant growth, and is most available as plant food in the form of two of its compounds, nitric acid and ammonia. Both of these substances are produced by the decomposition of animal and vegetable matter. They also exist in small quantities in the atmosphere, and may be washed down into the soil, where they become, in one form or another, food for plants. But the chief supply of nitric acid is obtained by the decay of organic matter through the chemical process known as nitrification, by which the nitrogen contained in the organic matter is separated from the carbon with which it is combined and converted into nitric acid. When thus liberated the nitric acid combines with certain bases in the soil and forms nitrates, such as nitrates of lime or soda or potash. These nitrates are easily dissolved and readily absorbed by the roots of plants. Thus, by the "alchemy of nature," nitrogen, which rarely exists in a state to be assimilated directly by plants, is transformed into available form for their use.

Phosphoric acid, the second of these essential elements, is not found in a free state, but always in combination with such substance as soda, lime, potash, etc. The most common form in which it is found is phosphate of lime, of which bones, South Carolina rock and a green mineral known as apatite, are largely composed.

Potash is usually applied in the form of salts, such as carbonate of potash, chloride of potash, etc. Wood ashes are especially rich in carbonate of potash. Another source of supply is the various "potash salts," chiefly obtained from Germany. The chloride or "muriate" of potash is largely used as a fertilizer in this country.

Well-made barnyard manure contains all the elements of plant food in due proportion and if it can be obtained in sufficient quantity and in the best condition the farmer need go no farther in quest of fertilizer. But it is a rare manure heat that has not lost, in one way or another, some part of its most important elements. It is amazing, considering how dependent the farmer is upon a full supply of the best fertilizer, that so few take the necessary pains to preserve their stable manure in the best way.

But it is seldom that a soil that has been long under cultivation can be maintained in a high state of fertility on barnyard manure alone. Artificial manures are needed to supply the necessary nitrogen, potash and phosphoric acid, and so it becomes a question of immense importance to the great agricultural industry that these fertilizers should be what they profess to be, and procurable at a price no higher than their real value. The utility of State and national analyses of these commercial fertilizers, showing just what their constituents are, and the agricultural value of the ingredients, has been thoroughly demonstrated; for many humbugs and extortions have been exposed by them, and no purchaser who will keep himself informed on the subject need be deceived into buying a worthless "fertilzer" at a high—or any—price.

But in the application of these fertilizers the farmer must find out for himself by experiment what his soil lacks. Soil analyses are often misleading, and it is much better to apply different fertilizers to a number of plots and note their effects. In this way every farm may become an "experiment station," to the great advantage of the owner.

Washing Butter in the Churn.

The churn is stopped when the butter is in granules, about the size of wheat kernels, and has come to the top of the buttermilk, shining sweet and golden through its white covering. The buttermilk is then drawn off into a pail, which has a wire sieve set into it. When the butter granules begin to run into the sieve, cold water is thrown into the churn upon the butter, the cover put on and the churn revolved from one to three times, according to the temperature of the water, as I do not wish to have the butter gather until it is thoroughly washed and salted. Sometimes—not often—the butter will seem to hang in the buttermilk, will not rise to the top, and hardly any buttermilk can be drawn off; then a pailful of cold water should be added, the churn revolved a few times, and the buttermilk can be drawn off as before. The butter should not be handled in any way either with the hand or ladle during the washing or salting, as it cannot be done without gathering more or less, and it is very necessary that each granule should be distinct until it receives its seasoning of salt. Simply pour in the water, revolve the churn a few times, draw off the water, and repeat until the water runs off clear. If you are so unfortunate as to have specks in your cream, this washing will remove the particles, so that there will be none left in the butter. If this water is very cold—38 to 40 degrees or lower—the last water is warmed to 58 degrees, and the churn turned only once; then it is drawn off immediately. The butter should test about 52 degrees when ready to salt; it is then allowed to drain while the salt is prepared. Unless you have seen freshly washed butter just at this stage, you cannot imagine how beautiful it is, each particle by itself, cool and fragrant, and of the rich golden color that it will be ordinarily after standing 24 hours.—Mrs. H. D. Shattuck.

Points of a Good Dairy Cow.

In buying or rearing dairy cows, always try to have them of some good breed. Grades of the Ayrshire, Alderney or Shorthorns are the best. She should be of medium size; fine head; very broad between the eyes; eye of a mild and pleasant expression; small horns of a waxy color preferred; rather a long neck, which must be thin but may be deep; barrel round, and ribs arching well from the back; body long; back straight; hips broad—can scarcely be too much so; tail falling at right angles with the back, and should be long and fine; hind-quarters rather long and thin; udder well developed, particularly the forward part of it; teats standing well apart, of medium size, and pointing forward; the coat should be of medium length fine, and of a silky feel; the skin should be loose and mellow and of a yellowish tinge.

Experience has taught us that a cow combining the greatest number of the above points is the most profitable for the dairyman to keep. Such a cow will give a greater quantity and a better quality of milk than a larger and coarser animal. Our experience has been confined almost entirely to the native, but we believe that judicious crossing with milking families of thoroughbreds would result in immense advantage to the dairy farmer. We would not advise any one to stock a farm with pure-bred stock, of any breed, believing that grades of one-half or three-fourths blood at the utmost, will be found most profitable in the long run, for milk and butter.—Practical Farmer.

Land Too Rich For Strawberries.

I was recently talking with a friend who lives only two miles from Mr. C., and who marketed last year $500 worth of strawberries from an acre and onehalf, and he told me that his crop would have been moresatisfactory and yielded more money if the land had been poorer. It was a piece which had been heavily manured for cabbages and onions for several years, and the growth of foliage was excessive and the fruit so soft that it was difficult to get to market, six miles away, in a perfect shape. The varieties were Bubach and Haverland pollenized with Jessie and Glendale. He charged the softness to an over-supply of nitrogenous manure in the soil, or the same cause that makes wheat lodge. Had this field been planted to early potatoes, then sowed to wheat or stocked with clover, plowing under the young clover the next spring, and then planted to strawberries, probably 200 bushels of potatoes and 30 of wheat per acre could have been taken off without at all impairing the soil for strawberries. Mr. Terry, who, by a three years' rotation of potatoes, wheat and clover, gives no opportunity to the white grub, plants strawberries on a rich clover sod, and manures but slightly, so as not to lodge the wheat which follows the strawberries, the latter being planted in a corner of the potato field. Mr. T. gets very successful yields of strawberries in this way on land that produces one year with another 28 or 30 bushels of wheat per acre, so this is a very good guage for the requisite fertility of strawberry ground.—Vick's Magazine.

Red Water.

This is a disease of badly fed cows which suffer from indigestion the result of which is to disturb the functions of the liver and change the condition of the blood. The blood is thin and watery from a deficiency of fibrine and red globules, which are lost through the kidneys and communicate a dark brown, red or black color to the urine. Cattle, feeding in woods or swamps and forced to eat coarse unwholesome herbage, are usually affected in this manner. The method of prevention is obvious. The mode of cure is to give an active purgative to relieve the liver; a pint of raw linseed or olive oil, with two drachms of phodophillin, may be given after which copious drinks of linseed tea, with two-drachm doses of chocolate of potassa, add two drachms of powdered ginger, should be continued for several days. Nutritious and easily digested food, as bran mashes cut feed with ground corn and oats, or chopped oats; are required.

Agricultural Brevities.

Kindly care of stock promotes growth and increases fatness.

The Shropshire sheep is one of the best of the mutton breeds, and gives a good fleece besides.

With many crops the margin of profit and loss is determined by the greater or less care bestowed in their cultivation.

At the Eastern Maine Fair a cheese manufacturer exhibited several eight-pound cheeses—just the thing for family supply where a large cheese is not wanted.

Dehorning cattle is strenuously opposed by some humane persons on the ground of cruelty. It is not a sound objection, because cattle frequently inflict serious injury upon each other with their sharp horns, causing, in fact, more suffering often than the removal of the horn does. But the operation should be performed, as far as possible, when the animal is young; and "breeding off" is better than sawing or cutting off.

Suppressing the Press.

The arrest of two editors for printing an extract from another paper questioning the validity of the anti-lottery law is certainly carrying thing pretty high in this land of free speech and liberal government.

The Post has no objection to the stamping out of the lottery companies, but the line should be drawn, it thinks, at that point where irresponsible underlings of the government attempt to stamp out the press.

On this line the Atlanta Constitution says that "this policy will not work. If lotteries cannot be destroyed without also destroying the freedom of the press, the people will be in favor of letting the lotteries alone. We cannot afford to yield our right to speak and publish fair criticisms of public measures. If we yield the right in one instance we may expect to be forced to keep silence whenever it suits the government to demand it. Fortunately it is no easy matter to bulldoze the newspapers of America. The menace of fine and imprisonment will intimidate very few. No matter what Federal officials may hold, the newspaper men of the country will not change their conviction that an honest criticism or discussion of the provisions contained in the anti-lottery law cannot with any show of justice be held to be a violation of that law. If they are mistaken in this belief, then the law will have to be repealed or modified. In this republic the government cannot array itself against the press and have the support of the people."

It is the policy and practice in some of the monarchies to inhabit criticism by the press of the acts of government, but until the enforcement, or the alleged enforcement, of the anti-lottery law no one dreamed that such a thing would be attempted in the United States.—Houston (Tex.) Post, Sept. 16.

The One He Wanted.

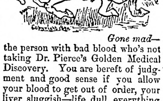
Superintendent. "How is this, Murphy? Ten cents all you took in on your round trip?"

Conductor. "Yes, sir. I struck an orphan asylum picnic. They went down and back with me, and every one of 'em, savin' the woman in charge, was under age."

Eighty years Johnson's Anodyne Liniment has led. No better indorsement wanted by us.



Gone mad—the person with bad blood who's not taking Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery. You are bereft of judgment and good sense if you allow your blood to get out of order, your liver sluggish—life dull, everything blue, for you may soon find out that you're in the grave—or next to it—because you did not procure the G. M. D. soon enough, and some dread disease, may be influenza or consumption, may be typhoid or malarial fever, has taken you. Consumption is Lung Scrofula. For Scrofula in its myriad forms, and for all Liver, Blood and Lung diseases, the "Discovery" is an unequaled remedy. Everybody, now and then, feels "run-down" "played-out,"—with no power to generate vitality, in fact, just too sick to be well. That's where the right kind of medicine comes in, and the "Discovery" does for a dollar what the doctor wouldn't do for less than five or ten.

We claim that nothing like it has been discovered for a blood-purifier. It's guaranteed by the makers. Your money is returned if it dosen't benefit or cure you.

TELL IT O'ER AGAIN.

If once or twice will not suffice
  To make the story plain,
That we rehearse in prose or verse,
  We tell it o'er again;
With tender care and oft with prayer,
  The message we impart,
Until the child from play beguiled,
  Has learned it well by heart.

But even then, with tongue and pen
  In fitly chosen words,
The theme is spread, to music wed
  As sweet as songs of birds;
And far and near some heart sincere
  Takes up the glad refrain,
And quick to heed another's need,
  Repeats it o'er again.

Thus every day, along our way
  To many or to few,
The story is told that is so old,
  And yet is ever knew;
And if we fear it is not clear
  Or wooing is in vain,
How eagerly and tenderly
  We tell it o'er again!

But in our homes oft times there comes
  A shadow fraught with ill,
That casts a blight o'er all things bright,
  A hard, forboding chill;
And well we know by signs that show
  The bitter grief and pain
Of hearts that grieve from morn till eve,
  That love is on the wane.

This is the time that souls sublime
  Will gather round their own,
With tenderness and fond caress
  For past neglect atone;
And though of old their love they told
  In language terse and plain,
Fear 'twill disarm, and do no harm
  To tell it o'er again.

—Josephine Pollard.

A STORY OF WAR TIMES.

Just as It Was Printed as News Nearly Thirty Years Ago.

HEADQUARTERS POST,
FRANKLIN, Tenn., June 9, 1863.

Last evening about sundown two strangers rode into camp and called at Colonel Baird's headquarters who presented unusual appearances. They had on citizens' overcoats, Federal regulation pants and caps. The caps were covered with white flannel havelocks. They wore side arms and showed high intelligence. One claimed to be a colonel in the United States army, and called himself Colonel Austin; the other called himself Major Dunlap, and both represented themselves as inspectors-general of the United States army. They represented that they were now out on an expedition in this department inspecting the outposts and defenses, and that day before yesterday they had been overhauled by the enemy, and lost their coats and purses. They exhibited official papers from General Rosecrans, and also from the War Department at Washington, confirming the rank business. These were all right to Colonel Baird, and at first satisfied him of their honesty. They asked the colonel to loan them $50, as they had no coats and no money to buy them. Colonel Baldwin loaned them the money, and took Colonel Austin's note for it. Just at dark they started, saying they were going to Nashville, and took that way. Just as soon as their horses' heads were turned, the thought of their being spies struck Colonel Baird, he says, like a thunderbolt, and he ordered Colonel Watkins, of the Sixth Kentucky Cavalry, who was standing by, to arrest them immediately. But they were going at lightning speed. Colonel Watkins had no time to call a guard, and only with his orderly set out on the chase. He ordered the orderly to unsling his carbine, and if, when he, the colonel, halted them, they showed any suspicious motions, to fire on them without waiting for an order. They were overtaken about one-third of a mile from here. Col. Watkins told them that Colonel Baird wanted to make some further inquiries of them, and asked them to return.

This they politely consented to do, after some remonstrance on account of the lateness of the hour and the distance they had to travel, and Colonel Watkins led them to his tent, where he placed a strong guard over them. It was not until one of them attempted to pass the guard at the door that they suspected that they were prisoners. Colonel Watkins immediately brought them to Colonel Baird under strong guard. They at once manifested great uneasiness, and pretended great indignation at being thus treated. Colonel Baird frankly told them that he had his suspicions of their true character, and that they should, if loyal, object to no necessary caution. They were very hard to satisfy, and were in a great hurry to get off. Colonel Baird told them that they were under arrest, and he should hold them prisoners until he was fully satisfied that they were what they purported to be. He immediately telegraphed to Gen. Rosecrans, and received the answer that he knew nothing of any such men, that there were no such men in his employ nor had his pass.

Long before this dispatch was received, however, every one who had an opportunity of hearing their conversation was well satisfied that they were spies. Smart as they were, they gave frequent and distinct evidence of duplicity. After this dispatch came to hand, which it did about 12 o'clock (midnight), a search of their persons was ordered. To this the major consented without opposition, but the colonel protested against it, and even put his hand to his arms. But resistance was useless, and both submitted. When the major' sword was drawn from the scaddard there were found etched upon it these words: "Lieut. W. G. Peter, C. S. A." At this discovery Colonel Baird remarked, "Gentlemen, you have played this d——d well."

"Yes," said Lieutenant Peter, "and it came near being a perfect success." Then they confessed the whole matter, and upon further search various papers showing their guilt were discovered upon their persons. Lieutenant Peter was found to have on a rebel cap secreted by the white flannel havelock.

Colonel Baird immediately telegraphed the facts to General Rosecrans, and asked what he should do, and in a short time received an order to "try them by a drum-head court-martial, and if found guilty to hang them immediately." The court was convened, and before daylight the case was decided and the prisoners informed that they must prepare for immediate death by hanging.

At daylight men were detailed to make a scaffold. The prisoners were visited by the chaplain of the Seventy-eighth Illinois, who, at their request, administered the sacrament to them. They also wrote letters to their friends and deposited their jewelry, silver cups, watches and other valuables for transmission to them.

The gallows was constructed by a wild cherry tree not far from the depot and in a very public place. Two ropes hung dangling from the beam, reaching within eight feet of the ground. A little after 9 o'clock a. m. the whole garrison was marshaled around the place of execution in solemn sadness. Two poplar coffins were lying a few feet away.

Twenty minutes past 9 the guards conducted the prisoners to the scaffold. They walked firmly and steadily, as if unmindful of the fearful precipice which they were approaching. The guards did them the honor to march with arms reversed.

Arrived at the place of execution, they stepped upon the platform of the cart and took their respective places. The provost marshal, Captain Alexander, then tied a linen handkerchief over the face of each and adjusted the ropes. They then asked the privilege of bidding a last farewell. This being granted they tenderly embraced each other. This over, the cart moved from under them and they swung in the air. In two minutes the lieutenant ceased to struggle. The colonel caught hold of the ropes with both hands and raised himself up for about three minutes and ceased to struggle at five minutes.

At six minutes Dr. Forrester, surgeon Sixth Kentucky Calvary, and Dr. Moss, Seventy-eighth Illinois Infantry, and myself, who had been detailed to examine the bodies, approached them and found the pulse of both full and strong. At seven minutes the colonel shrugged his shoulders. The pulse of each continued to beat seventeen minutes, and at twenty minutes all signs of life had ceased. The bodies were cut down at thirty minutes and coffined in full dress. The colonel was buried with a gold locket and chain on his neck. This locket contained a portrait and a braid of hair of his intended wife; her portrait was also in his vest pocket. These were buried with him at his request. Both men were buried in the same grave—companions in life, misfortune and crime, companions in infamy, and now companions in the grave.

I should have stated in another place that the prisoners did not want their punishment delayed, but, well knowing the consequences of their acts, even before the trial, asked to have the sentence, be it hanging or shooting quickly decided and executed. But they deprecated the idea of death by hanging, and asked for a commutation of the sentence to shooting.

The elder and leader of these unfortunate men was Lawrence Williams of Georgetown, D. C. He was as fine-looking a man as I have ever seen, about six feet high, and perhaps thirty years old. He was a son of Captain Williams, who was killed at the battle of Monterey. He was one of the most intellectual and accomplished men that I have ever known. I have never known any one who excelled him as a talker. He was a member of the regular army with the rank of captain of cavalry when the rebellion broke out, and at that time was aid-de-camp and private sectary to Gen. Winfield Scott. From this confidence and respect shown him by so distinguished a man may be judged his education and accomplishments.

He was a first cousin of General Lee, commanding the army of the Rappahannock. Soon after the war began he was frank enough to inform General Scott that all his sympathies were with the South, as his friends and interests were there, and that he could not fight against them. As he was privy to all General Scott's plans for the campaign, it was not thought well to turn him loose, so he was sent to Governor's Island, where he remained three months. After the first Bull Run battle he was allowed to go South, where he joined the confederate army, and his subsequent history I have not been able to learn much about. He was a while on General Bragg's staff as chief of artillery, but at the time of his death was his inspector-general. When he joined the confederate army he altered his name thus: "Lawrence W. Orton, Col. Cav. P. A. C. S. A."—Provisional Army Confederate States of America." Sometimes he wrote his name "Orton," and sometimes "Auton," according to the object which he had in view. This we learn from papers found on him. These facts in relation to the personal history of Colonel Orton I have gathered from the Colonel himself, and from Colonel Watkins, who knows him well, they having belonged to the same regiment of the regular army—Second United State Cavalry. Colonel Watkins, however, did not recognize Colonel Orton until after he had made himself known, and now mourns his apostasy and tragic fate.

The other victim of this delusive and reckless daring was Walter G. Peter, a lieutenant in the rebel army, and Colonel Orton's adjutant. He was a tall, handsome young man of about twenty-five years, who gave many signs of education and refinement. Of his history I have been able to gather nothing. He played but a second part. Colonel Orton was the leader, and did all the talking and managing.

History will hardly furnish a parallel in the character and standing of the parties, the boldness and daring of the interprise, and the swiftness with which discovery and punishment were visited upon them. They came into our camp and went all through it, minutely inspecting our position, works and sources, with a portion of their traitorous insignia upon them, and the boldness of their conduct made their flimsy subterfuges almost successful.

To the last, however, they denied being spies. They claimed that they were endeavoring to get through our lines in order to visit friends in the North and Europe. But this story was so poorly matured that when either told it it would not hang together, and there was little resemblance between the accounts which the two gave. The arrest so completely confounded them that they were never able afterward to recover from it.

The unfortunate men made no complaint at the severity of their punishment, except that they deprecated the ignominy of being hanged. They were too well informed not to know that upon conviction of being spies, they must suffer death, and hence they expected it and made no complaint.

Colonel Orton, who recognized Colonel Watkins as soon as he saw him, told him that he barely escaped with his life when the arrest was made—that he had his hand on his pistol to kill him and escape. Had it been any one else he would have done so.

Colonel Orton delivered his sword and pistols to Colonel Watkins and told him to keep and wear them. He also presented him with his horse, which he valued at $5,000, and asked him to treat him kindly for his sake.—Atlanta Intelligencer.

BABY'S FOOT.

It Is Said to Greatly Resemble a Monkey's.

"How many people have ever taken notice of a baby's foot, except to admire its pinkness and prettiness?" said a well-known scientist. "And yet to the anatomist it is a revelation. Take, for example, the tootsies of a child of 10 months that has never walked or stood alone. It has a power of grasping to some extent and is used instinctively like a hand. The great toe has a certain independent working, like a thumb, and the wrinkles of the sole resemble those of the palm. These markings almost entirely disappear after the pedal extremity has come to be employed for purposes of support and locomotion.

"The hands and feet of a human being are strikingly like those of the chipanzee in conformation, while the gorilla's resemblance to man in these respects is even more remarkable. The higher apes have been classified as 'quadrumana,' or 'four-handed,' because their hind feet are hand shaped; but this designation is very improperly applied, because the ape's posterior extremities are not really hands at all. They merely look like hands at the first glance, whereas in fact they are but feet adapted for climbing. The big toes can not be 'opposed' to the other toes as thumbs are to the fingers, but simply act pincerwise for the purpose of grasping.

"Now, funnily enough, the 'infant's' feet have this same power of grasping pincer fashion, and the action is performed in precisely the same way. Advocates of evolutionary theories take this to signify that the human foot was originally utilized for climbing trees also before the species was so highly developed as it is now. Also they assert that the fact of the art of walking erect is learned by the child with such difficulty proves that the race has only acquired it recently."

AN UNSELFISH STEED.

Remarkable Unselfishness of a Clergyman's Horse.

A doctor and a clergyman were exercising their horses one morning in a country lane, when an argument arose between them as to which of the animals possessed the sweeter disposition.

"I'll wager that if their respective tempers could be tried," said the doctor, "mine would be far away the better."

"That's all nonsense," retorted the clergyman. "My mare has the best temper of any horse in the neighborhood."

"Well, here's a stiff hedge, let us try their leaping capabilities," suggested the doctor.

"Right you are," agreed his friend.

The doctor's hunter quietly refused to jump, although put at it again and again. The clergyman's little mare also refused, but at the same time put back her ears and exhibited considerable ill-temper. When repeatedly urged to jump she finally accomplished a clever back-jumping feat, which threw her master over the hedge. Strange to relate, the reverend gentleman was unhurt, and, scrambling to his feet, commenced to scrape the mud from his broadcloth, whilst the doctor laughingly remarked:—

"Perhaps you are convinced now that my animal has a better disposition than yours."

"Not at all," replied the clergyman. My mare is such an unfelfish little brute that though unable to take the fence herself, she had no desire to keep me from going over. In fact, she facilitated the mode of my transit, whilst your horse displayed a dog-in-the-manger temperament by not going himself and not allowing you to go either.

His Answer.

"Do you shave yourself all the time?" asked the barber.

"No; I stop occasionally for meals," said Jimpian, savagely.

"German Syrup"

A Throat and Lung Specialty.

Those who have not used Boschee's German Syrup for some severe and chronic trouble of the Throat and Lungs can hardly appreciate what a truly wonderful medicine it is. The delicious sensations of healing, easing, clearing, strength-gathering and recovering are unknown joys. For German Syrup we do not ask easy cases. Sugar and water may smooth a throat or stop a tickling—for a while. This is as far as the ordinary cough medicine goes. Boschee's German Syrup is a discovery, a great Throat and Lung Specialty. Where for years there have been sensitiveness, pain, coughing, spitting, hemorrhage, voice failure, weakness, slipping down hill, where doctors and medicine and advice have been swallowed and followed to the gulf of despair, where there is the sickening conviction that all is over and the end is inevitable, there we place German Syrup. It cures. You are a live man yet if you take it.

Official Paper of the City.

During the past week Ireland that sorrowful nation has suffered an irreparable loss. She has given to the world a list of martyrs made so by the tyrannical hand of English rule, but she now weeps not for the crimes of others heaped upon her beloved sons—but remorse for her own actions will for centuries to come cause tears of repentance to moisten the grave of one who suffered death at the hands of an ungrateful people. Charles Stewart Parnell, the once great benefactor of the Irish people, was on Sunday laid at rest in the land he loved so well and to-day a whole nation and a nation's people scattered throughout the world mourn his loss. Whatever were his moral failings they were outnumbered by his noble acts and will be swept into oblivion. He has done more to set Ireland aright before the people of the world than perhaps any other Irishman who labored with the English government for justice to that unfortunate country. The solemn respect shown the dead statesman is an exemplification of the forgiving kindness of the Irish people—in his untimely death they see their great error. They were influenced by their clerical superiors to bring upon their leader a slow yet sudden death. To-day his most bitter enemy in Irish ranks would wish him back and follow his leadership. His name will go down in history with O'Connel, O'Neil, Emmett and that vast hoard of patriots and martyrs who labored for a down trodden people. Every Irish American to-day sorrows for the dead. They silently lament—not alone for the dead hero but for the cause he left behind—not alone for the cause but for the people who so badly needed his help. He taught the world that Ireland deserved justice and his teachings will ere long force England to submit.

There must be union between the twins. When a St. Paul senator and a Minneapolis politician embark in a vote hunt it is time for the governor to interfere.

The niggardly appropriation for the world's fair should be dealt out by those most sanguine economists whose action will disgrace the state before the civilized world.

It will be utterly impossible to procure more than two million feet of dead and down timber on the Red Lake reservation this year, within sufficient hauling distance of the streams.

Pears' Soap of London expend between half a million and $600,000 annually advertising, half of which comes to the United States. They are supposed to be the largest advertisers in the world, and probably are.

The work of surveying the Red Lake Reservation is progressing very slowly. The great amount of work yet to be done—estimating the timber—will not be accomplished for years unless the department moves more rapidly in the future.

The republicans have opened the campaign in the state for '92. Already the toot of their infant tin horn industry is heard from the sandy beach of Red Lake to the mud banks of the Minnesota; while grain in Brown's Valley is shocked and the trees tremble in the vicinity of Pine City.

Expect to win.

It is time the democrats should awake to the inconsistencies of the hour.

The Republican party in this section is endeavoring to make political capital out of an assertion purporting to come from Comr. Hall, to the effect that the present contractors for logs on the Red Lake reservation will not have a monopoly the coming winter. Who the parties are who have contracts at present for logs on the Red Lake reservation is not a matter of record and if Comr. Hall ever made such a statement he does not know whereof he speaks. The monopoly, if such a thing existed in the past, was a very beneficial one to the Indians as the logs sold under contract brought from one dollar to one dollar and fifty cents more per thousand feet than the logs that were sold to the highest bidder on the Clearwater river and White Earth reservation. When the Republican party is desirous of crushing monopolies they can find a broader field than the Red Lake reservation offers.

SECOND CAMPAIGN

I start today. Edgar Julian will be with me.
LARGELY.

Mr. Roosevelt saw at once that Ellis had in him the germ of success, and he viewed him as all the more dangerous on account of his youth and inexperience. Genius is often successful where trained experience would fail; it is the success of audacity backed by enthusiasm.

The telegram from Mr. Largely was the first intimation received at Roosevelt Place of Edgar Julian's return to Chicago. In fact he had just arrived from New York, and calling at once on Mr. Largely had found the latter quite excited over the dispatch from Savannah. To Mr. Largely this opportune return of his lawyer and financial adviser was a great relief. It lifted a heavy responsibility, and gave a mighty impetus to his energy.

Mr. Roosevelt himself felt that a good deal might justly be expected of Julian in the sharp struggle which must soon begin, a struggle which would ultimately involve the ownership of the most valuable railroad in Florida.

Sir Edmond Kane, a distinguished English baronet, and the representative of large London capital, had arrived in New York, and would soon be at Jacksonville with a view to capturing a portion of the system projected by Messrs. Roosevelt and Largely.

There was no time to be lost. Vigorous action and comprehensive judgment were called for. There must be a combination of forces and interests. It struck Mr. Roosevelt suddenly that his grand schemes were liable to burst at any moment.

Mr. Frank Ellis went right on, once he had started in his railroad operations. The newspapers began to be full of his doings. He was called a Southern Jim Fiske, a young Vanderbilt, and his power and influence increased prodigiously. He had gained the confidence and aid of New York capitalists, and his energy seemed without limit. It was as if a mountain storm had struck the stagnant waters of Savannah's financial circles. The bankers and brokers all looked out to see what it could mean.

Rosalie soon became aware of Mr. Ellis' brilliant movements, though he never mentioned them to her. She read the newspapers, and Colonel Talbot often spoke in high praise of the "young railroad king from the Cherokee hills," who was revolutionizing internal improvements in Florida and southern Georgia. She could not help feeling a certain pride in Ellis' success on the score that he was from the "pocket." Of course his success as yet consisted of mere movements which pointed out his aims, for there had not been time for anything more. His race had just begun, but his pace was astonishing. Meantime the effect of his rapid operations was immensely exaggerated by the newspapers; some accounts went so far as to place him in undisputed control of all the railroads in Florida.

Rosalie's imagination found food in the idea of this young mountaineer conquering the low country. She was glad to hear Mr. Roosevelt declare that Ellis' operations were all legitimate, and without any color of fraud or deceit. She perfectly understood that the young man had brought down upon himself an amount of public condemnation on account of his moonshine business, and she felt with pride the immediate value of his present high course. In some indefinite way she had a sense of responsibility for his actions, as if he had been her brother or other near kinsman. She was not aware that this feeling was an outgrowth of that clannishness which always exists among mountain folk.

"I am proud of your success," she said to him one day, as they sat together in one of the spacious Roosevelt parlors. "I do hope all your great plans will prove practicable."

His dark face flushed a little as he answered:

"It is so kind of you, Miss Chenier, to wish that. If I can always count on such a feeling from you I shall succeed in spite of all opposition."

She smiled, and not catching the covert or repressed sentiment of his last sentence, said:

"You can do that. The business you are now in has the approval of everybody, and"——

"Oh, well, the other business was infamous, but I didn't realize it till it was all over," he quickly interrupted. "You know the war had demoralized us up there in the mountains."

"We were shut out from a knowledge of what was doing in the world," she said. "I did not dream of what a strong current human life can be till I went up into the north."

"The current might be just as strong here in the south if we would make it so. What's the use of all this retrospection and brooding and despair? Our soil is just as good as ever it was; we have our health, our daylight, our nighttime. Is it the right sort of people we lack?"

The rich power of his voice thrilled her as he spoke, and he lifted his head proudly as if conscious of his strength. In a very tender tone he added:

"Miss Chenier, I am not going to be a drone and a grumbler. Do you recollect the time I met you up in the dark little dell by the spring above the mill?"

"Yes," she simply said.

He reflected a moment. His face was that of one who ponders a dear and doubtful proposition. Something like a pale heat gathered under the skin of his dark cheeks. He made a slow, soundless, hesitating movement with his lips, as if about to utter some precious and weighty sentence; but he turned and looked through the window and did not speak.

"You were in an evil mood that day," she presently added.

"Yes, but I had provocation," he quickly replied. "Those Yankees were tracking me as a hunter tracks a wild beast." (Since the war all northerners are called Yankees in the south.)

"Well, they did not hurt you, at least," she said, smiling archly.

"No, we are quits—they and I; our scores are even." He smiled also, and picking up her banjo, which chanced to be near him, began idly thrumming on its strings. After a moment he passed it to her.

"Play for me," he said; "it will recall the pastoral sweetness of the 'pocket.' It will drive away those unwelcome recollections. Sing the little French song your father used to love."

"About flying away?"

"Yes."

She immediately struck the preliminary notes, and then throwing back her head, as a bird does, began singing.

She gave infinite sweetness to the expression, and there was a charming discord between the light, lingering cadence of the French measure and the sudden blunt notes of the banjo. Her attitude was careless and graceful, the merest trace of infantile abandon in it, suiting perfectly the spirit of the song.

Ellis stole a glance at her face, a soft, dreamy light gathering in his eyes. Her voice was like a call to him from a higher and purer atmosphere, and he felt as if she had really wandered away, in her white robe of innocence, far beyond his reach.

"You have changed a great deal," he suddenly said, interrupting.

"Oh, have I?" she exclaimed, with a little flicker of self consciousness in her face. "Do I not sing so well as I used to?"

"You sing better. I did not mean that. I had reference to your—your looks."

"It's my clothes," she said, casting a quick, satisfied glance over her simple, but beautiful apparel.

"Not altogether—not at all," he responded. "You have learned a great deal, and you have grown more—more—beautiful."

"Have I?" she exclaimed, her eyes recovering their old sincerity, and her voice its childish freedom. "I have always wished to be beautiful."

"You are very, very beautiful," he said in a way which seemed to suppress a world of emotion. It was as if he were saying it from a great distance and did not expect her to hear it.

Whither their talk might at last have led them, one may say no more than surmise. Just then Mr. Roosevelt entered the hall with some one, and a voice that startled Rosalie reached the parlor.

"You shall make my house your home, while you are in Savannah, sir," she heard Mr. Roosevelt say in his hearty, hospitable way. "When did you say Mr. Largely will arrive?"

"Within three days at farthest. He had to go by way of Boston and New York," replied Edgar Julian.

"It is Mr. Julian," she exclaimed in a sort of breathless half whisper.

Ellis wondered at her agitation. Her cheeks had almost lost their color, and she was trembling. She had let the banjo fall upon the carpet at her feet, and sat in an expectant attitude, her lips slightly parted and her eyes turned upon the doorway.

A few moments later Mr. Roosevelt entered, followed closely by Edgar Julian.

Rosalie went to meet them, holding out her hand to the guest, and smiling radiantly.

Mr. Ellis measured with his eyes the form of the stalwart northerner, and rose as Mr. Roosevelt turned to introduce them.

The young men were of about the same stature, save that Ellis was the lither and more graceful.

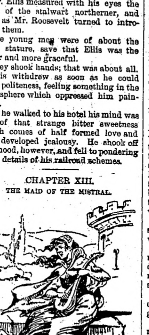
They shook hands; that was about all.

Ellis withdrew as soon as he could with politeness, feeling something in the atmosphere which oppressed him painfully.

As he walked to his hotel his mind was full of that strange bitter sweetness which comes of half formed love and half developed jealousy. He shook off the mood, however, and fell to pondering some details of his railroad schemes.

CHAPTER XIII.

THE MAID OF THE MISTRAL.



"The Maid of the Mistral."

Edgar Julian arrived at Savannah and was installed as a member of the Roosevelt household a day or two before the time of Mrs. Roosevelt's party. He immediately began a searching examination of the situation of his employer's affairs, and found it grave. Ellis had done his work well, and precisely in such a way as to close up the very doorway of their success. Julian could not see any immediate escape. Of course the plans of Messrs. Roosevelt and Largely had been kept profoundly secret, so that Ellis and his New York coadjutors could have had no counterplan in view, but their operations had effected quite the same thing as if directed to that end. The fact was that Florida had suddenly attracted the eyes of capitalists and land speculators in both Europe and America. Certain vast draining schemes were beginning to take shape, and their features and probable results to be bruited about. The orange fever, the jute fever, the early vegetable fever, the Le Conte pear fever and the pine and cedar lumber fever had started a rush of emigration; this advanced the price of land enormously; the consequence was that the state authorities offered large grants of the public domain as subsidies to induce the building of canals and railways. Many schemes had been projected; some of them had failed, others had fallen into litigation, and the franchises of nearly all of them were of doubtful validity. Out of this sort of chaos Edgar Julian was expected to bring order. For two days he buried himself in Mr. Roosevelt's office amid a heap of books, pamphlets and documents, plodding slowly, step by step, through the history of previous schemes and litigations.

In the meantime he scarcely more than spoke to Rosalie, who was longing to hear all he could tell her about Provence and le Chateau Chenier.

The evening for the party at the Roosevelt mansion arrived; charming weather with a cloudless sky, and the moon at its full; a breeze from the ocean just cool enough to make open windows a luxury.

The company was not large, between fifty and one hundred guests, but it was an exceptionally brilliant one. Julian passed from room to room in the course of the evening, finding himself once in the conservatory where a wilderness of tropical plants and trees were kept in a state of luxuriant confusion. Here he came upon Ellis and Rosalie Chenier, standing under a palm spray by a noisy little fountain. They were engaged in earnest conversation. He turned away and left them; but not before a swift pang had cut through his heart. How divinely sweet she looked standing there before the dark fellow, her rare face upturned to his! She wore a dress of some rich, clinging blue stuff that followed the outlines of her form; there was old lace about her throat, and she wore pearls in her pale gold hair; a single great ruby, the gift of Aunt Marguerite, shone like a big drop of red wine on the fair space at her throat.

Mrs. Roosevelt was a charming hostess, easy, affable, not seeking homage, as busy among her guests, and quite as unassuming, as a bee among flowers. She took great pains to introduce Julian, and always with some politely elusive suggestion of his distinguished character.

Few married women were present, and most of them were of the younger class, stately and reserved, as became southern matrons, but bright and interesting on occasion.

Toward the close of the evening Edgar Julian found Rosalie disengaged and offered her his arm.

"Won't you take a turn with me?" he said in a low tone; "all your guests seem happily fixed just now, and I may not have so good a chance to talk with you again soon. I am off for Florida to-morrow."

"So soon?" she exclaimed, taking his arm; "but you will not be gone long; you will return"——

"I cannot speak with certainty. I shall have to go to Jacksonville and Tallahassee, and then away down through the wilderness to Ocala and Tampa. I may be gone a month."

He enunciated the word month as if it had been century or æon.

"I should think you would enjoy that trip. I have always imagined I should like Florida," she said.

"But I have been traveling so much, and so rapidly," he replied, carelessly taking from a table, as they passed it, a spray of heliotrope.

"And you have not told me what you saw," she quickly said. "I do so much want to hear more about our old chateau in Provence. I call it ours," she added, looking up and smiling archly, "because I am so far away that the true owner cannot be injured by the assumption of title; and then papa has been fastening the fancy in my head ever since my first recollections."

"It ought to be a very pleasant fancy. I was charmed with Provence," he said, with something like evasiveness in his tone; "but one would not care to live there; it is all so different from what one sees and feels and reveres in America. Life in Provence is good for fancy to feed on, and for stuff out of which to build romance; but it is not conducive to earnest thought and worthy effort toward great achievements."

"But what was our old chateau like?" she demanded; "did you fetch any souvenir from its ruins?"

"Yes," he replied, "I brought quite a number. You shall examine them some day. One in particular will, if I mistake not, affect you very strangely when you see it."

"Oh, what is it?" she cried, in her excitement leaning heavily on his arm and gazing eagerly up into his face.

"It is something very beautiful," he responded; "I don't believe I ought to forestall or weaken your surprise by any attempt at description; and besides, I wish to see if you will adopt my view when you have seen the—the—well, let's call it the Chenier Souvenir."

"You have set my heart to fluttering," she naively said, carrying her free hand to her breast.

"Mine is disturbed too," he replied.

"It's really exciting, isn't it?" she went on, not dreaming of what his words were meant to convey.

"While I think of it," he said, changing his tone, "is Rosalie a name that runs back in your family?"

"It was my father's grandmother's name; it may date much farther up the line," she replied; "papa says it is a Chenier name. But why do you ask?"

"The name is common in France. I heard it often while I was there, and Chenier also. I met one Chenier who was a baron, and another who was a wooden shod laborer in the vineyards."

"But the souvenir?"

"Ah, yes, I shall show you that when I can. It is among my traps at Chicago. I did not have time to unpack, you know. I was rushed off down here without even a breathing space. I have written to have a lot of things forwarded and the souvenir is included. It must remain a profound and beautiful mystery until it arrives."

"I can't bear mysteries and waiting," she exclaimed with real vehemence. "I shall lose all interest unless you tell me now."

He stopped and looked down into her sweet gray-brown eyes, he thought he saw repressed tears in them. They were wholly the eyes of a child now. Her lips were red as cherries.

"It is a small gold cross with the letters R. C. on it," he said, with a promptness that almost amounted to bluntness; "it is very beautiful."

"Oh, and where did you get it?" she exclaimed.

"At the Chateau Chenier. A peasant who lives there dug it up in the garden. I paid an enormous price for it. The R. C. must stand for Rosalind Chenier, you know."

"How strange!" she murmured in a musing way, with her eyes cast down. "Papa has the story of that cross in manuscript, written in Provencal. It is a beautiful legend, called 'The Maid of the Mistral.'"

Julian smiled at her simple faith, but he would not have clouded it for the world. A great love for her had fastened itself upon him; it was struggling for expression, and yet he felt sure he ought not to speak. She seemed too much a child to have the fire of his passion revealed to her—it might destroy her as a flame would destroy a flower.

"Was the 'Maid of the Mistral' a love story?" he asked.

"Oh, yes, and so sweet! Alphonse, the knight, was so brave, and Rosalie, the Maid of the Mistral, was warm and true and good, and they loved each other so dearly. You know the mistral is a wind in Provence; the maid would sit upon the castle wall when the mistral blew, and play her lute and sing, and her lover would hear her, no matter where he was, because the mistral would take her song and the lute chords and bear them to him. She gave him the cross when he went away to fight for his king and he wore it on his heart through the far east. Whenever he would hear her singing and playing the lute he would kiss the cross, and when she had finished she would kiss the ruby ring he had given her. I cannot tell you all his adventures; but at last he returned, and they were married on the castle wall while the mistral was blowing."

"Very sweet," he said, "all those old, old stories are—shall I tell you one?"

The blood had suddenly flowed in upon his heart; his face was pale, and his voice was low and husky.

She looked up quickly, as if to confirm a thought, and a sudden flush spread over her face; her eyes fell at once. His passion had betrayed him.

"I am neglecting my guests," she tremblingly exclaimed; "see, some of them are going. You must excuse me—I must be polite."

CHAPTER XIV.

MANY MEN OF MANY MINDS.

"Come to my room and write me a bill."

Mr. Largely arrived from New York on the morning following the Roosevelt party, and Julian immediately left for Jacksonville on the same train with Ellis, who was going to Tallahassee.

These young men politely avoided each other. Julian had found out all the facts of Ellis' career, and with a lawyer's contempt for criminals, could not hide his aversion. As for Ellis, he was too busy with his schemes to give much thought to anything else; nor did he dream that Julian contemplated any work of circumvention.

The experience and success of Edgar Julian in the management of a number of most complicated and important railroad suits affecting the vast commercial and manufacturing interests of Chicago had given him wealth, prestige and unbounded self reliance. His name was at the head of the list of western railroad lawyers, and he deserved the distinction. But even the profoundest and shrewdest of men sometimes find a business skein, very simple in appearance, which refuses to be unraveled. Such an one was the Floridian railroad tangle.

Julian went to Jacksonville; Ellis went to Tallahassee. The former, with all his acumen and experience, found himself at fault; the latter, not knowing the dif-

State of Minnesota, county of Polk—ss.

In Probate Court, Special Term, October 6th, 18[illegible].

In the matter of the estate of Anton Suttner, deceased:

On reading and filing the petition of Fred Gesswein, agent for Mary Suttner administratrix, setting forth the amount of personal estate that has come into his hands, the disposition thereof, and how much remains undisposed of; the amount of debts outstanding against said deceased, as far as the same can be ascertained; the legacies unpaid, and a description of all the realestate, excepting the homestead, of which deceased died seized, and the condition and value of the respective portions or lots thereof; the persons interested in said estate with their residences; and praying that license be to him granted to sell all of the real estate described in said petition. And it appearing, by said petition that there is not sufficient personal estate in the hands of said agent for administratrix to pay said debts, the legacies or expenses of administration, and that it is necessary for the payment of such debts, legacies or expenses, to sell all of said realestate.

It is therefore ordered, that all persons interested in said estate, appear before this court on Monday the second day of November, 1891, at 10 o'clock a. m., at the probate office in Crookston in said county, then and there to show cause (if any there be) why license should not be granted to said administratrix to sell all of the realestate of said deceased as shall be necessary to pay such debts, legacies and expenses.

And it is further ordered, that this order shall be published once in each week for three successive weeks prior to said day of hearing, in the Red Lake Falls News, a weekly newspaper printed and published at Red Lake Falls in said county.

Dated at Crookston the 6th day of October, A. D. 18[illegible]1.
By the Court,
oc15-29 C. M. Benson, Judge of Probate.

Mortgage Sale.—Default having been made in the payment of the sum of fourteen hundred twenty-five and 35-100 dollars, ($1425.35) which is claimed to be due at the date of this notice upon a certain mortgage, duly executed and delivered by Thomas Perusse and Delima Perusse, his wife, to Josephine Majean, bearing date the 2d day of June, A. D. 1886, and, with a power of sale therein contained, duly recorded in the office of the register of deeds in and for the county of Polk and State of Minnesota, on the 18th day June, A. D. 1886, at 9:30 o'clock a. m., in book T of mortgages, on page 224 thereon, and no action or proceeding having been instituted, at law or otherwise, to recover the debt secured by said mortgage, or any part thereof. Now,

Therefore, notice is hereby given, that by virtue of the power of sale contained in said mortgage, and pursuant to the statute in such case made and provided, the said mortgage will be foreclosed by a sale of the premises described in and conveyed by said mortgage, viz:

The northwest quarter of section three in township one hundred and fifty north, of range forty three west in Polk county and state of Minnesota, with the hereditaments and appurtenances; which sale will be made by the sheriff of said Polk county, at the front door of the court house, in the city of Crookston in said county and state, on the 14th day of November, A. D. 1891, at 10 o'clock a. m. of that day, at public vendue, to the highest bidder for cash, to pay said debt and interest, and the taxes, if any, on said premises, and fifty dollars, attorney's fees, as stipulated in and by said mortgage in case of foreclosure, and the disbursements allowed by law; subject to redemption at any time within one year from the day of sale, as provided by law.

Dated September 26th, A. D. 1891.

The demand for realestate is constantly increasing. The fact is appreciated that valuations are steadily rising and investments made now will have the advantage of this.

Any denial of the fact that grain has been greatly damaged by the wet weather of the past week would be useless. The farmers themselves hardly wish to admit it, but reports from thrashing crews are very dubious. Even grain that has been stacked has been badly damaged, because in most cases the work was poorly done. Stacking is a science and it appears to be poorly understood by the majority of our farmers. The grain yet in shock has all more or less sprouted. The growth being often over an inch long already, and prospects good for a continuation of the growth. We may console ourselves with the fact that the prospect for a good season next year are enhanced by the copious rainfall of this autumn.

A country newspaper man, says the Printer's Album, has three stages of development. At first he runs a newspaper for glory; dissatisfied with results, he runs it for spite, and when he gets tired of this he runs it for revenue. Some editors assume the role of public reformer. A man who attemps to regulate the morals of his neighbors has his hands too full to run a newspaper. He is like a new preacher who started out to reform the world. At the end of the year he concluded to confine himself to the United States. Then he restricted his territory to Indiana; then he concluded that Jacksonville was all he could handle, and encountered so much wickedness that he finally despaired of saving his own soul eloped with a member of his own choir and has not been heard from since.

C. T. Walker, general good fellow and tragedian, has opened the Grigg's house at Grand Forks and is running one of the best hotels there. Mr. Walker is doing a big business—which everybody here will be pleased to learn.

Isaac Mulvaney has made his annual return trip to the fair Red Lake Falls. He is still a member of the wood sawing profession and has lost none of his old time affability.

Thomas Dargan and family have returned to our fair city from Gilby, where they spent the summer, and have moved into the section house.

Ernest Buse went to Minneapolis Tuesday night, from whence he will proceed to the Coast. Mr. Buse is in the lumber milling business at Vancouver. His card reads "Ernest Buse's Mill. All kinds of timber. Spruce and factory lumber. Cedar a specialty." Mr Buse is a great traveler, and when he has business to transact here usually "runs over" from Vancouver in preference to writing a letter. He is doing well in the lumber business out there.

The Great Northern railroad company has decided to construct the road only as far as the Red Lake river on the North Side, this season. The causes which have brought about this action are varied. The primary cause no doubt is the cost of right of way through this city. Property which before the coming of the railroad was worth only two hundred dollars a lot is now placed at one thousand or a fraction of a lot from two to four hundred dollars. We warned the property holders some weeks ago to be liberal in dealing with the officials, but to be forewarned was not to be forarmed as viewed by a majority of our property owners. When the people of Red Lake Falls get a good thing 'tis very few of them who can appreciate it. The work has ceased between the rivers mostly on account of high prices for the right of way. The road would have been a great benefit to the South Side if built—it would have made a business centre in the village—but the very men most deeply interested have killed the goose which was about to lay the golden egg. They now claim that the road never intended to build through the city. We do not consider this a just accusation. The road will eventually go south to its southern connections—but it will no doubt follow some other course through the village. As it is today the business men and property owners on the North Side wear a magnitudinous smile, knowing they will stand an equal show with the South Side so far as rail facilities are concerned.

SMALL PROFIT IN COWS.

EXPERIMENTS SHOW A SLIGHT MARGIN IN DAIRY FARMING.

Profitable Returns Are Generally so Meager That Great Care Should Be Used in Selecting Only the Best Animals—Success Depends on Manure.

The need of better cows for the dairy is coming to be very generally appreciated. The dairy commissioner of Iowa is reported as saying that the average cow in that state gives but 3,000 pounds of milk annually, while good ones yield from 5,000 to 6,000 pounds. The director of the Vermont station states that the average yield per cow in that state is only about 130 pounds of butter per annum, while there are thirty dairies in the state that average over 300 pounds per cow.

The director of the New York station says: "New York has 1,500,000 milch cows, probably producing, on an average, less than 3,000 pounds of milk per year, and the annual average butter product per cow for the state is undoubtedly less than 130 pounds. This should not be, when there are whole herds averaging 300, and some 400, pounds of butter per year for each cow. Animals producing these by no means phenomenal yields are not confined to any particular breed, and are often grades of our so called native or no breed animals. Proper selection, systematic breeding and judicious feeding have produced these profitable animals and herds."

The difference in the milk producing qualities of different cows is brought out very clearly by a series of experiments conducted at the Massachusetts State station, of which Professor C. A. Goessmann is director. They are especially interesting, because the cows and their feed and care were such as are found on the better farms of Massachusetts, and the results, obtained with the appliances of a well equipped experiment station, show in accurate and full detail the elements of actual profit and loss as they could not be found in ordinary farm experience.

EXPERIMENTS IN MASSACHUSETTS.

These experiments have been made with twelve cows, and have continued over five years. Grade Jersey, Ayrshire, Devon, Durham and Dutch and native cows were used. They were secured for the experiments a few days after calving, and fed until the daily yield fell below five or six quarts, when they were sold to the butcher. The length of the feeding period—i. e., duration of the experiment with each cow—varied from 261 to 599 days. Hay, fodder, corn, corn silage, green crops, roots and cornmeal, wheat, bran and other grain were used.

The daily ration per head consisted of eighteen to twenty pounds of dry fodder, or its equivalent of green fodder, and from 6¼ to 9¾ pounds of grain. Careful accounts have been kept of the history of each cow, including breed, age, number of calves, length of feeding period, amounts and kinds of fodder, yield of milk, chemical composition of feed, milk and manure, cost of cow and feed and values of milk and manure.

The following is a recapitulation of the financial record of the cows. The milk was reckoned at the price paid for it at the neighboring creameries. The value of the manure produced is calculated by assuming that of the total amount of food 20 per cent. would be sold with the milk and the remaining 80 per cent. saved as manure.

As farmers in the region buy commercial fertilizers for the sake of their nitrogen, phosphoric acid and potash, it was assumed that these same ingredients would be worth about as much, pound for pound, in the manure as in the better class of fertilizers, and accordingly the value of the manure was computed by taking the nitrogen as worth 16½ cents, phosphoric acid six cents, and potash 4½ cents, per pound. The return for feed consumed represents what the feeder receives for labor, housing of cattle, interest of capital invested, risk of loss of animals, etc.

RESULTS IN FIGURES.

The most profitable cow was bought for $60, fed 584 days and then sold for $28, making her actual cost $32, and the feed cost $135.05, so that the total cash outlay was $167.05. The milk brought $203.37 at the creamery, and the manure was estimated to be worth $56.93, making the total value received for feed consumed, $260.30. Subtracting the total cash outlay of $167,05 from this, there remains $93.25 as net return for feed consumed. Deducting the estimated value of the manure, the remainder "return in excess of estimated value of manure" is $36.32.

In the average for the twelve cows, the net return was $50.43, and the return in excess of the estimated value of the manure only $15.13. With the least profitable cow, the cash outlay for cow and feed exceeded the value of the milk and manure by $3.97; in other words, the net return for feed consumed was $3.97 less than nothing.

Subtracting the value of the manure, the total loss was $34.25; that is to say, allowing for the value of the manure, the results with the twelve cows varied from a gain of $93 to a loss of $3.97, or, if the value of the manure be left out of account, from a gain of $36.32 to a loss of $34.25.

It is noticeable that the profit or loss did not depend upon either the breed or the length of the feeding period. The most profitable cow, and the least profitable but one, were both of the same breed. Of the two most profitable cows, one was fed for 584 days and the other for only 278 days.

Two things, then, are brought out very clearly by these experiments. One is that in such localities as this the value of the manure goes far to decide the profit in feeding dairy cattle. Another is that cows which would ordinarily pass for good ones may differ widely in product.

To the practical dairyman these experiments teach clearly the difference between cows which are profitable and those which are not and the importance of selecting the best cows for his dairy and getting rid of the poor ones. In a larger sense they illustrate to every farmer the importance of knowing accurately the condition of his business. Upon this its success or failure largely depends.—Farmers' Bulletin No. 2, United States Department of Agriculture.

An Enthusiast in a Company.

Did you ever chance to sit in a room where every window was closed and all the sashes wool listed; where a steam radiator cooked the dead air as boiling water cooks a chicken? Where people sat around with bulging eyes and flushed cheeks until some blessed "crank" suddenly walked in and threw open a window? Oh, how the splendid ozone rushed in and set all the air a sparkle! Everybody straightened up, didn't they, and even the old cat gave a sigh of relief. Well, just what the fresh air is to a stuffy room is the right down, honest enthusiast to any company he enters. He exhilarates, purifies, quickens and makes alive. Blessed be his coming for ever and ever.—Chicago Herald.

In the 351 towns and cities of Massachusetts 248 now have free public libraries, and the state has lately provided aid for the 103 small towns and villages which have no libraries.

The exports of coal from Germany in the first six months of this year amounted to 4,454,505 tons, as compared with 4,264,760 tons in the corresponding period of 1890.

Queen Victoria is again a grandmother, this time via her daughter Victoria and the rather disreputable Battenburg. The youngster will hardly be appreciated for a few years in the unconscionably long string of taxeaters for whom the British producers toil.

The lake record between Buffalo and Duluth has been reduced to seventy-two hours, and as the distance is less than a thousand miles there is a good prospect for a further and material reduction in the water journey to "the zenith city of the unsalted seas."

A Hindoo princess, the Begum Ahmadee, has distinguished herself in London society as a singer of superior voice, talent, and cultivation. She is a descendant of the emperors of Delhi, and possesses a mezzo soprano voice of extraordinary richness and power, which is used with very high artistic taste. She has also great personal beauty.

A Great wagon road scheme is afloat for Western Washington. It is to have a public highway from the straits of Fuca to the Columbia River. This movement means a coast road of nearly three hundred miles in length, extending across the State. The result would be the immediate settlement of a big unoccupied territory, which would add immensely to the wealth of that portion of the State.

A superstitious Kentucky gambler, and gamblers are a superstitious lot, had been playing in hard luck for some days. He conceived the idea a few nights ago that if he were to open the grave of a woman who was recently buried, and take from her finger a ring which was buried with her, it would bring him luck. He dug up the body and secured the ring, and was caught wearing it. He was arrested and confessed.

Between Sept. 21 and 20 the water in Salton Lake, in Southern California, fell fourteen inches. The greatest depth of the lake then was thirty-six inches and its area thirty miles long and ten wide. Recent visitors do not think it has changed the climate of the surrounding country, and that the humidity in that neighborhood has been increased only in a modified degree, now registering 60°, while the ordinary humidity of San Francisco is 75.

Record smashing is the order of the day. A few days ago Mrs. Georgia A. Brown broke the divorce record in California. She filed her complaint at Oakland on Tuesday morning, the summons was served on Wednesday, on Thursday her husband put in a frivolous answer, and on Friday the answer was stricken out. The case was referred, testimony was taken, and the decree was granted on the same afternoon. Time, three and a half days.

The vastness of Maine's timber wealth, says the southern Lumbermen, is not generally appreciated. Every year now 500,000,000 feet of logs are cut in the state, about one-third of this amount floating the Penobscot, and the quality of the manufactured lumber that has been shipped from the state since the first sawmill was started is enormous beyond description. To-day the Penobscot log crop is sawed almost wholly for the American market, New York, New England ports and Philadelphia taking the bulk of it.

The police court of Cincinnati had a jury trial of a party accused of adulterating his milk. The case was made out and the jury retired to find a verdict. They remained retired for a long time, so very long everybody got tired. For hours they gave no sign. Finally the clerk, in disgust and weariness, climbed up and peeped through the transom to see if they were dead. There the jury sat around the table deeply immersed in a game of cards. The matter was reported to the judge, who at once sent for the jury and demanded of the foreman whether the jury could agree upon a verdict. "Ich weisznicht," responded the foreman. "The jury is discharged," roared the judge.

RAILROAD RUMBLINGS.

The Chicago, St. Paul & Kansas City Railroad company holds its annual meeting and re-elects its officers.

The Western Passenger association began its monthly session in Chicago. Nothing of importance was done.

According to the Railway Age, during the nine months ended Sept. 30, 2,892 miles of main line was built on sixteen different roads in this country. It seems probable that the total for 1891 will fall below 5,000. At present it is about 950 miles less than at the same time in 1890, when the total for the year reached nearly 5,738.

A London cable says that there is a hitch in the proposed international glove fight between Fred Johnston and George Dixon. The National club offered £500 for Dixon and Johnston to fight, and Johnston backers agreed to find any amount from £500 to £1,000 a side. Thomas O'Rourke has cabled the National club that he will not bring Dixon to England to fight Johnston unless the National club will put up a £1,000 purse. It is the opinion in London clubs that Dixon and his backers are afraid of Johnston, and to avoid the match insists on a big purse being put up.

After holding out over three weeks 300 strikers returned to work at Buell, Orr & Hurdmann's lumber mills at Ottawa, Ont. The demand for 10 hours work per day instead of 11 was conceded; but the demand for 50 cents a week more was refused. This makes five of the smaller mills which have conceded something to the strikers. Three big concerns, however, employing nearly 3,000 men say there is no chance of their giving in.

The six-year period for which the American Sewer Pipe Company was originally organized, will end in January, and it is believed that a return to the old plan of direct competition at that time is certain, as several very large plants have been in operation since the formation of the trust, and they could not be induced into making a larger percentage of their product than older concerns are likely to consent to.

A CHIEFTAIN TAKEN.

Charles Stewart Parnell, the Great Irish Leader Joins the Great Majority.

Mrs. Parnell and the Family Physician the Only Ones Present When the End Came.

London, Oct. 8.—Charles Stewart Parnell, having reached the age of forty-five years, is dead.

His remains lie in his home at Walsingham Terrace, Brighton, where only the doctors and his wife are said to have witnessed his demise.

The time of Mr. Parnell's taking off is fixed between the hours of 11 o'clock and midnight last night, though no tidings of the fact came up to London for the public until this morning. To say then that the metropolis was shocked with surprise would not convey even a mild impression of the feeling which greeted the news that Parnell had died.

The early day report that Mr. Parnell had died by his own hand spread far, and among the persons whom it reached was Mrs. Parnell. To-night she requests that an emphatic denial be given to rumors that her husband committed suicide. She states that he had which developed into the fever that killed him.

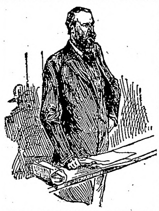
Mrs. Parnell, Mr. Parnell's step-daughter and the servants, according to the latest accounts of the death of Mr. Parnell, were the only occupants of the house on Walsingham Terrace when the Irish leader expired. The end, these later reports state, was one of intense agony for the sick man until the moment when he became unconscious and eventually died away without pain. Owing to the suddenness of the Irish leader's illness and to the belief of his wife and of the attending physicians that he would recover, no friends or relatives of his family or that of Mrs. Parnell, except her daughter, were present at Mr. Parnell's bedside when he died.

From the day he took to his bed, the state of Mr. Parnell's health was such as to necessitate the constant attendance of two physicians, but in spite of their incessant and untiring efforts to prolong or to save his life, Mr. Parnell sank lower and lower until he expired in the arms of Mrs. Parnell, who is utterly prostrated by the shock experienced through her husband's death.



It has been well known that Mr. Parnell has not enjoyed the best of health for years past, and it has been noticed and widely commented upon that since the O'Shea divorce developments became a matter of public notoriety and since political trouble came upon him, that the great Irish member of parliament had grown thinner, and that he had

PERCEPTIBLY AGED IN APPEARANCE.

But nobody expected to hear of his death, and no inkling as to his illness had reached the newspapers. The son of Dr. William Richard Powers, F. R. S., the author of many important medical works on diseases of the brain and of the spinal chord, including his "Manual of Diseases of the Nervous System," who has been attending Mr. Parnell, was the physician who watched the closing hours of his life. The great leader's condition was so bad throughout Tuesday that Dr. Powers was unable to leave his bedside from early that morning until Mr. Parnell breathed his last.

Mr. Parnell, it is now stated, suffered from congestion of the lungs, besides acute rheumatism. He became unconscious at 7 o'clock last evening. His physicians, who had gone for the evening, were hastily summoned to his bedside. They found him an hour later in an obviously hopeless condition.

RAPIDLY DECLINED.

Dublin, Oct. 7.—Now that Mr. Parnell is dead, it is said that it was a matter of notoriety among his intimate friends that his health had been rapidly declining for months past.

His friends and doctors, they say, urged him in vain to be more careful, but all their remonstrances were unavailing. Mr. Parnell continued to work at the highest pressure, and underwent constant privations and fatiguing journeys which would have ruined the health of the strongest man.

After the Sligo election, when Bernard Collery, the anti-Parnell candidate, defeated Mr. Parnell's candidate, Valentine B. Dillon, it was privately admitted that Mr. Parnell was greatly depressed, and that he felt himself obliged to resort to stimulants in order to sustain his nerves.

At Creegs, Sept. 27 last, Mr. Parnell complained of suffering from a peculiar pain in the region of the heart, which pain, he said, had never troubled him before. This was in addition to the rheumatic trouble in the arm which has already been referred to.

LIKE A THUNDERBOLT.

London, Oct. 7.—In this city particularly, the news of Mr. Parnell's death came down like a thunderbolt upon the clubs and in political circles. Nobody, so far as at first known, was even aware that he was indisposed and consequently, when it became known that the Irish leader was dead, naturally the first idea formed was that he had committed suicide.

Telegrams received here from Dublin and other towns in Ireland and the principal towns in England unite in reporting that the death of Parnell has caused the greatest sensation among his supporters, principally on account of the sudden manner in which he died.

In Dublin the late Irish leader's supporters are in a state of consternation. A meeting of these friends of Mr. Parnell was hastily called as soon as the news of his death became known, and at this meeting, which was only a preliminary gathering, it was decided that a meeting of all Mr. Parnell's followers in that city should be called to consider what steps to take in the face of what may be termed a most disastrous event for their party.

THE POLITICAL EFFECT.

London, Oct. 7.—In an interview to-day, Justin McCarthy, member of parliament for Londonderry and leader of the anti-Parnell faction of the Irish Parliamentary party, discussing the political effect of Mr. Parnell's death, said that it was impossible to forecast the political effect of the death of Mr. Parnell.

A MOTHERS'S GRIEF.

Bordentown, N. J., Oct. 7.—The news of her son's death was first made known to Mrs. Parnell by a reporter this morning.

When the reporter was announced Mrs. Parnell evidently divined that he had some information relating to Mr. Parnell, for she exclaimed: "What has befallen my son?" Seeing that the reporter hesitated, she continued: "Is he ill, or worse, has he been shot, or did he shoot himself?"

The reporter broke the news to her as gently as possible, and when he at last announced that Mr. Parnell was dead the white-haired mother reeled backward and fell on the floor.

"Oh, my son; oh, my good, kind Charles, they have killed you," she shrieked. The scene was heartrending. She was seized with hysterics and by turns she laughed and wept.

"That viper," she exclaimed after she recoveed, pointing a long bony finger at the house of her half-brother, Edward Stewart, "that viper over there kept me away from him. He began a suit for $15,000 against me to dispossess me from my home, and I spent my all defending it. When Charles wrote to me asking me whether I needed anything I told him the crops were bringing me in plenty of money. That cheered him, and it pleased me to say so, although I was in poverty. Oh, he was a good and dutiful son and never neglected me. "Lies, lies, lies, all lies, when they say he refused to provide for me. I say it's slander, foul slander."

Then the old lady paced up and down the room sobbing convulsively.

BIOGRAPHICAL.

Charles Stewart Parnell was born at Avondale, County Wicklow, Ireland, in 1846. He inherited his belligerent and aggressive qualities from a source no further back than his grandfather, Commodore Charles Stewart, the famous commander of the frigate Constitution, whose remarkable capture, in single fight, of the two British men-of-war Levant and Cyane won for him the surname of Old Ironsides.

On the other side of the house Mr. Parnell was the lineal descendant of Thomas Parnell, Esq., who owned estates in Congleton, Cheshire, England, and settled in Ireland during the reign of Charles II., about 1630. It would be a laborious task to follow out all the limbs of a genealogical tree as old and far-spreading as that which sprung from Thomas Parnell of Cheshire, who died about 1700, leaving his estates in England and Ireland to his eldest son, Thomas Parnell, Jr., then a famous poet and afterward archdeacon of Clogher, prebendary of Dublin and vicar of Fingloss.

After his death, in 1717, the baronetcy and estates descended to John Parnell, Esq., member of parliament for the borough of Grauard and subsequently one of the judges of the king's bench. He married Mary, daughter of Thomas Whitshed, lord chief justice of the king's bench. The issue of this union was three sons and one daughter. The estates ultimately descended to John Parnell, bart., third son, who was returned to parliament for the town of Mayborough in 1761. He was commissioner of the revenue, and by patent of 1766 was created a baronet of Ireland. He married Anne Ward, a descendant of the Lady Sophia Woudout and the earl of Petersborough, and died in 1782, leaving one son, the Rt. Hon. Sir John Parnell, chancellor of the exchequer, lord of the treasury and groom of his majesty's most honorable private council, who died in 1801, after a long and distinguished life, leaving his eldest son, John Augustus Parnell, heir to his baronetcy and estates.

Shortly after the close of the war of 1812, in which Commodore Stewart, commander of the old Constitution, played so glorious a part, Miss Stewart, his only daughter, went to England, where she subsequently married Sir John Parnell, the third baronet and grandson of the Right Hon. Sir John Parnell, chancellor of the exchequer. They removed to Avondale, in the county of Wicklow, Ireland, where was born in 1846. He was educated under a private tutor, and when eighteen years of age was sent to Magdalene college, Cambridge, England. Shortly after graduating he was initiated into Irish politics, and at once took up the cause of the people. With the aggressive, irrepressible blood of the Stewarts on one side and the party spirit and political prestige of the Parnells on the other, the young graduate was a politician by nature and inclination.

"But," says Mrs. Parnell of her son, "he did not always possess the cool temper and presence of mind that he now shows in his debates in the house of commons. When a boy he grew so angry when his will was disputed that his face became purple with passion. He was imperious with the servants, as most young landlords in that country are, and until his visit to America, shortly after he became of age, he was a bitter Conservative in politics."

His visit to this country was partly on private business connected with his godfather's estate and partly to study our institutions and government. After his return to Ireland his political tenets are said to have changed marvelously. He lowered the rates of his tenants and raised the wages of those in his employ. In bearing and deportment he became quiet and well balanced. In 1874 Mrs. Parnell returned to America and settled upon Commodore Stewart's estate at Bordentown, N. J., where she now resides. In the same year Charles Stewart Parnell made his first appearance before the public as high sheriff County Wicklow, Ireland. He ran for parliament on the Catholic and National ticket and was defeated. The following year he was returned to parliament by a large majority from County Meath. His freedom of speech, regardless of older and more experienced men, soon provoked the hostility of his Conservative fellow members. He always spoke whenever he had anything to say, and refused to be put down, with the pertinacity of a true Stewart. He was not gifted with remarkable eloquence, and was never what may be called brilliant. But he was a ready and fluent speaker. In 1878 he was elected president of the Home Rule confederation, in the place of Mr. Isaac Butt. He was subsequently elected to represent the city of Cork. He displayed remarkable ability both as a parliamentary debater and tactician, and as an organizer in the interest of the Irish Home Rule party. He identified himself with the tenant farmers of Ireland in the struggles with absenteeism and high rents, and was chiefly instrumental in forming and sustaining the land league of 1879-80.

CAUSED GLADSTONE'S DOWNFALL.

The fall of the second Gladstone cabinet is chargeable to Charles Stewart Parnell, the Irish agitator. Ever since Gladstone's accession to the premiership, the Irish member voted with the government. Parnell, however, thinking that his party had been given little else than promises, withdrew his support.

In 1879 Mr. Parnell made a visit to the United States with the design of interesting the Irish-American population in the cause of the land league. While in that country he lectured before several state legislatures and finally before the house of representatives at Washington. The honor of addressing this branch of congress had previously been conferred upon but three persons—Lafayette, Kossuth and Bishop England of Charleston.

Upon his return home he became bitter in his attitude towards the landlords and the government, and it was charged that this led to disorder in Ireland. From this charge he was subsequently vindicated. In November, 1880, informations were laid by the Irish attorney general against Mr. Parnell and other members of the land league executive. The trial ended in a disagreement of the judges. In the opening of the session of 1881 the government brought in a coercion bill, and to that measure, as well as to the arms bill, Mr. Parnell and his colleagues offered all obstructions possible, prolonged over seven weeks. On Feb. 3 at last thirty-four of his followers were removed by the sergeant-at-arms for causing obstruction in the house of commons. Land league demonstrations followed the passage of the land act, and the government proclaimed the land league to be an illegal association, and Mr. Parnell issued the "no rent" manifesto. Mr. Parnell remained in Kilmainham jail till April, 1882, when he was released on parole in order to attend the funeral of a relative. He was formally released May 2. Then followed the resignation of Mr. Forster and Lord Cowper, the Phœnix Park murders and the stormy debates on the crimes bill.

In these scenes and the subsequent organization of the National league in 1883, and in parliament in 1884-6, Mr. Parnell was the most conspicuous figure. On the dissolution of parliament he returned, he claimed, by eighty-five members. It was to meet this situation that Mr. Gladstone proposed home rule, in which he was supported by Mr. Parnell and the whole strength of his party. The sensations growing out of the Parnell commission and the Times libel suit are of too recent occurrence to need special mention here. Misfortune overtook Mr. Parnell in the public notice of his relation to Mrs. O'Shea, whom he recently married. The attitude of Mr. Gladstone and the Irish bishops compelled his deposition as an Irish leader.

A JAG WITH A JAGUAR.

Account of a Desperate Fight Between a Man and a Jaguar.

A Demerara correspondent describes a desperate fight between a man and a jaguar, which recently took place on the Demerara River. The hero of the combat, a black, named Lally Davidson, a farmer, was out with his dog, which roused a jaguar from its lair. The ferocious animal made tracks for the thick scrub, followed by Davidson and his dog. Being closely pressed the jaguar climbed a tree, where Davidson shot it, wounding it in the head. This made the animal descend, and again he dived into the bush, pursued by Davidson. The beast concealed himself in some brambles, and as Davidson was again trying to take aim the jaguar leaped upon him, knocking him bodily into a drain full of water. Davidson now engaged in a desperate struggle with the fierce brute, and seizing the jaguar now somewhat exhausted from loss of blood he exerted all his strength, and managed to hold his head under water until he was slowly suffocated. But before this the jaguar had severely wounded the courageous man; his hand was badly bitten, the scalp on the left side of his head was partly ripped off, and his left eye was gouged out. Suffering as he was, Davidson slowly crawled home, and while he went into hospital sent his friends for the dead jaguar. The latter measured five feet eleven inches from head to tail. Davidson, on whose happy escape his friends congratulated him, was slowly recovering when the last mail left Demerara.

TEA IN AUSTRALIA.

The Compound Which the Vitiated Antipodean Palate Craves.

In all up-country places men drink tea. They drink all day long and at every meal, in amazing quantities, and at a most unwholesome strength.

The method of preparation is simple, and one would think that if the aim were to brew a connection altogether poisonous it ought to be effectual. On Sunday mornings the tea-maker starts with a clean pot and a clean record. The pot is hung over the fire with a sufficiency of water in it for the day's brew, and when this has boiled he pours into it enough of the fragrant herb to produce a deep coffee colored liquid. On Monday, without removing yesterday's tea-leaves, he repeats the process. On Tuesday da capo, and on Wednesday da capo, and so on through the week. Toward the close of it, the great pot is filled with an acrid mash of tea-leaves, out of which the liquid is squeezed by the pressure of a tin cup. By this time the "tea" is the color of rusty iron, incredibly bitter and disagreeable to the uneducated palate. The native calls it "real good old post and rails," the simile being obviously drawn from a stiff and dangerous jump, and regards it as having been brought to the very pitch of perfection. Doctors tell of cases resulting from this abuse which closely border, in their manifestations, on the signs of delirium tremens.—From the Brandon Bucksaw.

The Wealth of Queen Victoria.

An act was recently passed enabling the Queen to make a will, as she was not before this supposed to be the possessor of any property, and the impression prevails that she has effected large savings. This is not the case. Although she has for many years lived in retirement, her expenditure has not materially decreased, for the mise en scene of royal pageantry is still kept up. She has expended considerable sums upon the purchase of the estates of Osborne and Balmoral, and their maintenance falls on her. She has, too, made considerable monetary presents to her daughters on their marriages, so that, although she inherited £250,000 from a silly person who left her this amount, her private fortune is comparatively small. Two years ago Lord Salisbury's government submitted to Parliament a proposal to endow her grandchildren. A committee of the House of Commons was appointed to consider this demand, when it was decided that provision ought only to be made for the children of the Prince of Wales. The committee was informed, under a pledge of secrecy, of the total value of her Majesty's investments. As I was a member of the committee, I cannot, of course, violate this pledge; but I do not think that I am breaking confidence in saying that the amount was surprisingly small.—Forum.

Touched the Button Himself.

The following incident happened at Oroville, Cal. It was a handsome solitaire and she evidently desired the jewler to know that it was her engagement ring. "I would like to have this ring cut down to suit my finger," said the handsome heartsmasher, as she flourished the brilliant ring before the eyes of the jeweler. The jeweler took the ring and smiled—he had seen it before. "I can fix that in a minute," he replied. Screwing a magnifying glass in his eye and taking a small sharp-pointed instrument in his hand, he touched a minute button on the inside of the ring and made it the exact size, saying, as he placed it on her finger: "You see, these rings are made in this manner for the reason that they are worn by so many different people; it is a great convenience." The young lady sailed out of the store burning with indignation and the only reason she did not fly was because she didn't have wings. What did she think? You know; and it is only necessary to state that she did not wear the ring. Another girl has it now, but this time the jeweler was not permitted to touch the button—the young man did it himself.—Jewelers' Circular.

The wide guage freight crashed into the narrow guage, demolishing the coach and several cars all of which took fire and burned. The trainmen saw the danger in time to jump, and as there were no passengers aboard no one was injured. The loss in cars and freight will be considerable.

The Nineteenth Century Woman.

There is an old belief of the masculine Anglo-Saxon mind that a woman, to be lovable, should have no marked individuality. But with this world's rapid advance through the Victorian age, woman has become more than ever perplexing to the male atom who poises himself for a moment to make a study of her. She no longer needs man's apparel to practise a profession or to journey forth on foot under the green leaves of Arden. She has grown self-reliant and cosmopolitan, equally at home in the White House or on the banks of the Neva. She never plucks daisies and buttercups nowadays, to test her lover's affection by pulling apart their petals. You find her, instead, arranging orchids in a glass, and making cynical reflections upon the worthlessness of the entire race. Individual love or hate in the opposite sex is apparently all one to her.—From "The Point of View," in Scribner.

TWO MEN ARE SHOT

Shooting of Two White Men by an Indian Near Chicago Junction.

One Man Dies of His Wounds, but the Other One Will Recover.

SHELL LAKE, Wis., Special, Oct. 13.—A terrible shooting affray took place near Chicago Junction last night. An Indian named John Warren, or Winan, called at the house of Ed Johnson, a prominent farmer.

A few minutes after he had gone a shot was fired through the window, striking Andrew Wicklund, who was inside, in the body from the effects of which he died. Another shot was also fired, taking off one of Johnson's fingers and landing in his side. The lamp was quickly extinguished, and at 9 o'clock Johnson went to Superior Junction and telegraphed the news to this village and Spooner.

Johnson was so exhausted by the loss of blood that he stopped at the house of Frank Sauben overnight, where his finger was amputated this morning.

The sheriff and a large number of men are looking for the Indian, who with his family fled during the night. He will perhaps be shot by some of the enraged settlers when found. No cause is known for the shooting.

HAVE GROWN RETICENT.

Omaha Citizens Now Not Acknowledging They Were in the Mob.

OMAHA, Oct. 13.—Three additional arrests were made this morning of citizens charged with participating in Friday night's lynching. The preliminary hearing of the fifteen lynchers charged with the murder of Coe, the negro rapist, which was set for this afternoon, was postponed until Monday. All of the men have been released on bail except three men who have apparently no friends. It is announced by the prosecuting attorney that he will push the cases for all they are worth.

When the coroner's inquest was begun to-day County Attorney Mahoney came in with a request that it be postponed until Oct. 22. He desired to get done with the preliminary hearings of the men now under arrest before the inquest should begin. The police are out with warrants, and it is safe to say that fully fifty more men will be arrested charged with murder before the week is out. The people who laughingly acknowledged having been in the crowd Friday night are now extremely reticent.

The results of the lynching are many, one being a scandal among police circles, the mayor having declared that he warned the chief of police in ample time to have the jail protected, while the chief asserts an exact contrary. The matter came up in the meeting of the police commissioners tonight, and a voluminous report was submitted by the chief to show that he took all possible precautions to protect the prisoner. The controversy is not unlikely to result in a change in the police department.

Wanted Witnesses.

GLENWOOD, Minn., Oct. 13.—The county attorney handed papers to Sheriff Olson Saturday for the arrest of Carl and Eli Quist, of the town of Minnewaska, Pope county. They were arrested this morning, brought to this place and lodged in jail, charged with murder. This charge dated back to May 23, 1891, when John Quist struck Lars Borgstrund on the head with a hatchet while quarreling over a dozen railroad ties, killing him. The boys were witnesses to the killing. At the coroner's inquest, held at that time, they were acquitted of being implicated in the murder, but were bound over. County Attorney Oistun and Attorney General Clapp appear for the state and W. W. Erwin for the defendants.

Held for Trial.

MASON CITY, Iowa, Special Telegram, Oct. 13.—William Darrow, who is charged with the murder of Peter Larson near Thornton, has been bound over in $5,000 to appear at the next term of the district court. This case has attracted wide-spread attention. It is thought he will be unable to get bonds, and will have to remain in jail. The body of Larson has not as yet been recovered.

Serious Charges Against a Farmer.

ABERDEEN, S. D., Special Telegram, Oct. 13.—John Cole, a farmer living southeast of Groton, is to have a hearing to-morrow on the charge of abducting and raping the fifteen-year-old daughter of August Mafs, another farmer.

Teaching the Teachers.

MORA, Minn., Special Telegram, Oct. 13.—The school teachers' institute opened here to-day with a full attendance of all teachers in the county. Prof. Hyde of St. Cloud is instructor, and Prof. Kirk is expected here to-morrow.

KILLED HIS AGED FATHER.

Cold-Blooded Deed of a Young North Carolinian.

RALEIGH, N. C., Oct. 13.—Sherman Greer and his two crippled brothers lived with Rev. William Greer, their father, an aged preacher, in Wilkes county. Sherman and a friend went home drunk and began shooting. Rev. Mr. Greer ordered his son to leave the house, and the young man shot him. Sherman's friend, a young man named Francis Watson, caught the old man, and Sherman again fired, killing his father.

The crippled lads gave the alarm, and a pursuit was made. The desperadoes stole a horse and defied the posse. Many shots were fired, and Fayette Walsh, one of the posse, was dangerously wounded. Sherman and Watson escaped. Church organized a posse and pursued them into Tennessee. At one point there was a battle, during which forty shots were exchanged. The Tennessee authorities captured the fugitives, and they are now in jail at Wilkesbury.

Schooners Condemned.

WASHINGTON, Oct. 13.—Capt. Hooper, commanding the revenue steamer Corwin, has telegraphed to the treasury department his arrival at Port Townsend for coal, on his way to San Francisco. He also reported that the trial of the schooners Ethel and La Nymphe before the United States court at Juneau for violating the modus vivendi had resulted in the condemnation of both vessels.

A DISCOVERY.

Blood Upon the Engine Leads to the Discovery of a Fatality.

DULUTH, Special Telegram, Oct. 13.—Sunday morning, as the engineer of a Northern Pacific freight was oiling at Carlton he discovered that his engine was plentifully splashed with blood. Search near South Superior soon revealed the frightfully mangled body of a young man. The remains were identified by means of clothing and other distinguishing marks as those of William F. Coulter, aged twenty-five years, employed as brakeman on the Mitchell & McClure logging road. It was supposed that he slipped in trying to board the train and fell between the cars.

Shot by a Companion.

LONG PRAIRIE, Minn., Special, Oct. 13.—Yesterday Charles Schwartz, sixteen years old, who lives about six miles southeast of this village, was shot and instantly killed by a neighbor's boy about his own age. The lads had been hunting and had been shooting at a target with a rifle. Anton Anderson, who did the shooting, had loaded his gun and set it down while talking with the victim and another lad. He apparently forgot that his gun was loaded, and dropping a bullet down the barrel said he would shoot Charley without any powder, picked up the gun and sent a charge through the boy's heart, tearing away the muscle of one arm where it entered. The boy was killed instantly. The shooting was purely accidental.

A Fatal Headend Collision.

SHAKOPEE, Minn., Oct. 13.—A headend collision early yesterday on the Minneapolis & St. Louis road north of this city, between an Omaha and Minneapolis & St. Louis freight. Fireman Thomas Rogers of Albert Lea was killed, being wedged between the cab and tender. The engineers and other fireman saved their lives by jumping. Both engines are badly stove up, and the tenders of the engines crushed through the first freight cars. The engineer of the Omaha claims that his orders were to run to Chaska, and the engineer of the Minneapolis that he was to run to the Summit, a mile east of the accident. Therefore, they both seem to be blameless.

A Young Life Crushed Out.

LITTLE FALLS, Minn., Special Telegram, Oct. 13.—Robert Burkel, a young man employed about the Northern Pacific station here, was killed by the cars this morning. He was struck by a car that was pushed on to the side track at the depot and his back was broken and body badly bruised. He called for some of the trainmen two or three times, but when he was found he only said, "I am killed." He was aged sixteen years and the son of John Burkel, who runs a dray line.

Burglars at Work.

EAU CLAIRE, Wis., Special Telegram, Oct. 13.—Three more burglaries were added last evening to the already long list in this city during the past month. The burglars entered a barber shop and two dwellings and took considerable money and jewelry.

FERGUS FALLS, Minn., Special Telegram, Oct. 13.—M. Frankoviz's hardware store was burglarized last night. Revolvers, knives and guns to the value of $125 were taken. This is the third time this store has suffered.

A Stockman Killed.

RAPID CITY, S. D., Special Telegram, Oct. 13.—Algernon L. Holcomb, better known as Bud Holcomb, was thrown from his horse yesterday and received injuries from which he died in five hours. The accident happened while he was rounding up cattle on the reservation sixty-five miles east of here. Mr. Holcomb was one of the most prominent and wealthy cattlemen in South Dakota. He leaves a wife and two children.

Old Acquaintances Wed.

HASTINGS, Minn., Special, Oct. 13.—Dr. J. E. Finch was married to Mrs. S. J. Franklin of Port Rowan, Can., on the 7th inst. They arrived here to-day. The doctor is one of the oldest practitioners in the state. His bride is one of his early acquaintances. They will make their home in Salt Lake City.

No Trace of the Lost Girl.

ST. CLOUD, Minn., Oct. 1s.—The father of the girl who is lost in the woods in Morrison county was here to-day endeavoring to procure bloodhounds with which to trace the missing girl. The search is being prosecuted with the utmost vigor, but no trace of her has yet been found.

The Divorce Colony Excited.

SIOUX FALLS, S. D., Special Telegram, Oct. 13.—There is a great hubbub among the divorce colony here because of Mrs. Tinker's write-up thereof in a prominent Eastern paper. It is charged the facts were furnished by Mrs. Blaine, with the understanding that she should be excluded.

Killed Himself While Hunting.

NORTHWOOD, Iowa, Special Telegram, Oct. 13.—Frank Haunches, son of Joseph Haunches, a prominent farmer of Union township, accidentally shot and killed himself yesterday while duck hunting, the charge striking him full in the mouth.

Destructive Prairie Fire.

HURON, S. D., Oct. 13.—A prairie fire near Hitchcock yesterday burned 800 bushels of wheat on Alva Gee's farm, the house and buildings on the Minard farm, and a number of other vacant buildings; also a large quantity of hay and some grain in stack.

Cabled the Police.

MONTREAL, Quebec, Oct. 13.—Yesterday the chief of police here received a telegram from Premier Mercier to send a detective and a sergernt to Toureveur, the premier's country residence. The reason for the call is unknown, but it is stated that an attempt was made upon the life of the premier.

Killed by a Premature Discharge.

MASON CITY, Iowa, Special Telegram, Oct. 13.—Frank Hunches, a young farmer living near Plymouth, had his face and the top of his head blown off to-day. It was occasioned by the premature discharge of a shotgun. Death was instantaneous.

Returned a Corpse.

LITCHFIELD, Minn., Special, Oct. 13.—The body of Allen J. Salisbury, who died yesterday in St. Paul from injuries received Saturday in an elevator at Schuneman & Evans', arrived home this morning. He will be buried Wednesday.

A Fisherman Drowned.

STOUGHTON, Wis., Oct. 13.—While fishing yesterday Lars Amundson and Henry K. Lien were capsized. Lien was saved, but Amundson was drowned. The deceased was forty years old, and leaves a wife and one child.

Lighted by Electricity.

LEMARS, Iowa, Special Telegram, Oct. 13.—The city was lighted by electricity last night for the first time. Fifteen arc lights furnishes an abundance of light for the business streets. Other lights will be put in as soon as the dynamos can be put in place.

Died Away From Home.

LITCHFIELD, Minn., Special, Oct. 13.—W. E. Wilson, a traveling man from Chicago, died at the Howard house to-day after an illness of a little more than a week. His wife arrived last night and was thus with him in the last few hours of his life. His body was started for home to-day.

DIGGER INDIAN TASTES.

A California Lion Adventure Which Ended in a Feast.

While traveling on the Pacific Coast some time ago in search of health and useful information I found myself, late in the Autumn, at Bass's Station, on the Stillwater, in Shasta County, Cal. A more delightful place can hardly be imagined. Becoming attached to the little settlement, I remained there for some time, and in company with Mr. Bass and his son-in-law, Mr. Dunning, made many excursions into the surrounding country.

One day we started out on a hunting expedition, well mounted and armed with Winchester rifles. After several hours of different sport we came to a deep spring at the foot of an overhanging rock and shaded by a widely spreading tree.

"I must have a drink," I said, stopping my horse and springing to the ground, and without noticing that my companions were riding on I placed my rifle along the edge of the spring, knelt down upon it, bending over began to quench my thirst. All at once there was a slight rustling in the leaves over my head, then a rushing sound in the air, and before I could look up or change my position it seemed as though a mountain had fallen upon me.

I was borne down into the water, my face and head being submerged, and then it was that I felt the sharp claws of some wild beast piercing my flesh and its cruel teeth fastening themselves in my neck. With great difficulty I managed to raise my head above the water and gave utterance to a shriek as never passed my lips before, and the next instant I had the satisfaction of hearing the sound of rapid approaching footsteps. Then there was a pause, then the sharp report of a rifle, and the animal on my back, with a cry of rage or pain, leaped to the bank and darted off through the chaparral.

It was a California lion: and it was not my cry alone that had brought my successor, for at sight of the beast, my horse, with a neigh of terror, had started off in the direction taken by my companions. Seeing the riderless animal they had stopped and turned when my cry reached them, and throwing his bridle to Bass Mr. Dunning had leaped to the ground and rushed toward the spring with his rifle ready. I was out of the water by the time he reached me, and, though badly wounded and shaken was burning for revenge.

"Come," I said, picking up my rifle, "let's track that cowardly beast and put an end to him; I never can go home satisfied if we do not."

"All right," was the reply; "come on, if you feel able, I think we can find him again."

At that moment we heard the crack of Bass's rifle and knew that he was on the track of the beast. We hurried forward and came up with Bass just in time to see the lion take to a tree.

"Now we have him," said Dunning, and running to the tree we began to salute the wild beast in its branches. Dunning succeeded in breaking its foreleg, and my second shot brought it tumbling to the ground quite dead.

"It's yours," cried my friend. "What will you do with it?"

"I'd like its skin, I replied, "to take East as a trophy."

"That we can manage," said Mr. Bass, "provided we can get the creature home."

"I think my horse will carry it," said Dunning, and we attempted to put it on his back. The animal made a great fuss at first, whinnying and trembling in every limb, but at last, when its master had mounted, it consented to go along quietly enough. My horse was soon recovered, and an hour later we arrived home safely with our game and deposited it on the ground back of the barn.

"Now," said Bass, "we'll leave it till some Diggers come along, whom we can easily get to skin it and prepare the pelt."

Two days passed with no signs of an Indian, but on the evening of the third day, when the game was no longer fresh, Billy Button, a smart young Digger, came along with Red Bird, his blushing bride, and old Big Head, his father-in-law.

"Now we are all right," said Mr. Bass, and hailing the trio he called them back of the barn, where, pointing to the dead lion, he said:

"Skin him; how much?"

Without a word Billy drew his family to one side, and having filled his own and his father-in-law's pipe, they squatted on the ground and smoked them out; then, after a few muttered words between them, he arose and, approaching us, said:

"One dollar."

"Too much," rejoined Bass; "four bits."

The Digger turned away. Another pipe followed, when he came up again with "six bits."

"No," said Bass, firmly, "four."

Again Billy returned to his family and, after the usual pipe, informed us that they would do the job for four bits provided they could have the carcass.

"All right," said Bass. Then to me: "You have no objections, I suppose?"

"Objections?" I exclaimed, "none in the world. They may eat it for all I care."

"That's just what they mean to do," was the matter-of-fact reply.

"Great Scott! you don't mean it?" I exclaimed.

"Wait and see," said Bass.

And sure enough a few minutes later a fire was kindled, the skin was stripped from the wild beast, and large pieces of the flesh were cooking over the burning coals. The three, in an evident state of bliss, feasted far into the night, and when I visited the spot the next morning I found the skin nailed to the side of the barn, but no other vestige of my enemy did I see, all had disappeared with the noble red man.—N. Y. Recorder.

Caution!—There have recently been issued several cheap reprints of the 1847 edition of Webster's Unabridged Dictionary, an edition long since superannuated. These books are given various names,—"Webster's Unabridged," "The Great Webster's Dictionary," "Webster's Big Dictionary," "Webster's Encyclopedic Dictionary," etc., etc.

Many announcements concerning them are very misleading, as the body of each, from A to Z, is 44 years old, and printed from cheap plates made by photographing the old pages.

Improved Passenger Service.

Under the new time schedule of "the North-Western Line," C., St. P., M. & O. Ry., all passenger trains of this lin make the trip between St. Paul and Chicago in less than 14 hours.

The Pullman and Wagner Vestibuled Limited, leaving St. Paul at 7:30 p. m. makes the trip to Chicago in 13½ hours and from Chicago to St. Paul in 13 hours and 25 minutes.

The Daylight Express leaving St Paul at 7:45 a. m. makes the trip to Chicago in 13 hours and 50 minutes and from Chicago to St. Paul in 13 hours and 45 minutes.

This is the only line running all its trains in less than 14 hour between St. Paul and Chicago, and while this time is quick trains don't have to run at as high speed to make their time as on other lines, because this is shorter than any other line.

In addition to these facts this is the only line by which connections are assure in Chicago with all fast line trains from Chicago to the East and South in the morning and at night.

Note.—Fares by this line are always as low as by any other.

For Map Folder of the line addres T. W. TEASDALE, Gen'l Passenger Agent St. Paul, Minn.

Astray Notice.

The Mystery Solved.

A jockey overheard a conversation in a stable that excited his curiosity and lead him to make a thorough investigation which resulted in the following valuable discovery. That Metzger's Angleworm and Wormwood Oil Liniment for horses has no equal as it keeps their joints limber and gives them good action, and for sprains, etc., it cures quickly, as every one is aware of the penetrating qualities of angle and wormwood oil. Call on W. A. Schreiter and get a bottle as he reports it's giving universal satisfaction. Price 50c and $1 per bottle.

Happy Hoosiers

Wm. Timmons, Posmaster of Idavill. writes: „Electric Bitters has done more for me than all other medicines combined for that bad feeling arising from Kidney and Liver trouble." John Leslie farmer and stockman, of the same place, says: "Fiend Electric Bitters to be the best Kidney and Liver medicine, made me feel like a new man." J. W. Gardener, hardware merchant, same town says: Electric Bitters is just the thing for a man who is all run down and don't whether he liver or dies; he found new strength, good appetite and felt just like he had a new new lease on life. Only 50c. a bottle, at W. A. Schreiter's Drug Store.

The Impending Danger.

Consumption Cured.

An old physician, retired from practice having had placed in his hands by an East India missionary the formula of a simple vegetable remedy for the speedy and permanent cure of Consumption, Bronchitis, Catarrh, Asthma and all throat and Lung Affections, also a positive and radical cure for Nervous Debility and all Nervous Complaints, after having tested its wonderful curative powers in thousands of cases, has felt it his duty to make it known to his suffering fellows. Actuated by this motive and desire to relieve human suffering I will send, free of charge, to all who desire it, this recipe in German, French or English, with full directions for preparing and using. Sent by mail, by addressing with stamp, naming this paper. W. A. NOYES 820 Powers' Block, Rochester, N. Y.

State of Minnesota, county of Polk—ss,
In probate court, special term, Sept. 28th, 1891.

In the matter of the estate of Amanda C. Watson, deceased.

Letters testamentary on the estate of said deceased being this day granted unto John Watson of said county, it is ordered that all claims and demands of all persons against said estate be presented to this court, for examination and allowance, at the probate office in the city of Crookston on the first Monday in March, 1892, at 10 o'clock in the forenoon.

It is further ordered, that six months from the date hereof be allowed to creditors to present their claims against said estate, at the expiration of which time all claims not presented to said court or not proven to its satisfaction, shall be forever barred, unless for cause shown further time be allowed.

Ordered further, that notice of the time and place of the hearing and examination of said claims and demands shall be given by publishing this order once in each week for three successive weeks prior to the day appointed for such examination, in the Red Lake Falls News, a weekly newspaper printed and published at Red Lake Falls, in said county.

Dated at Crookston the 28th day of Sept. D. 1891.

By the Court, C M. BENSON,
Judge of Probate.

Mortgage Foreclosure Sale.

Default having been made in the payment of the money secured by a certain mortgage, duly executed and delivered by Silvester Johnsen and Julia Johnson, his wife, of Polk county, Minnesota, mortgagors, to Francis W. Noyes, mortgagee, bearing date the 7th day of July 1882, and, with a power of sale therein contained duly recorded in the office of the register of deeds in and for the county of Polk and state of Minnesota, on the 8th day of July, 1882, at 11:10 o'clock a. m. in book F of mortgages on pages 362 to 365 and no action or proceeding having been instituted, at law or otherwise, to recover the debt secured by said mortgage, or any part thereof. The amount claimed to be due upon said mortgage at the date hereof is the sum of four hundred and ninety seven dollars ($497) besides the sum of one hundred thirteen and 11-100 dollars for taxes necessarily paid by said mortgagee and interest, and twenty five dollars, attorney's fees, stipulated for in said mortgage.

Now, therefore, notice is hereby given, that the said mortgage will be foreclosed by a sale of the premises described in said mortgage, viz:

The east half of the southeast quarter and the east half of the north east quarter of section number thirty-two in township No. one hundred and forty nine north of range forty-five west, and containing one hundred and sixty acres of land more or less, according to the government survey thereof in Polk county, and state of Minnesota, which sale will be made by the sheriff of said Polk county, or his deputy, at the front door of the court house, in the city of Crookston in said county and state, on the 28th day of November, 1891, at 2 o'clock p.m., of that day.

Dated October 1st, A. D. 1891.

Progressive Ideas.

The following comes from New York: An organized effort is under way among farmers to secure from congress free mail delivery in country towns. The Farmers Alliance, Patrons of Husbandry and other orders are canvassing the matter. Letters are being written to congressmen in favor of the project and petitions to congress for free delivery are being circulated in many parts of the country. Farmers assert that a daily mail delivery at their doors will ad perceptibly to the money value of their farms and will be worth still more because it will keep them in touch with markets and the outside world and rob life of its isolation and monotony. The farmers are writing to the agricultural press that this convenience would enable them quite generally to take a daily paper as well as to subscribe for the local papers more liberally. In the American Agriculturist for November, Postmaster General Wannamaker states definitely for the first time that the experiment made by the postoffice department for free delivery in farming districts shows that the increase of revenue more than pays all the increased expense. He believes that universal delivery would, therefore be self sustaining. Mr. Wannamaker's article also contains this statement of the case:

"While the postal service keeps pace with the growth of the towns, the farmers quarrymen blacksmiths, millers and artisans, all paying the regulation rates of postage, are left to get their mail as best they can from the post office in the village or at the railroad station. In a hamlet of 100 houses, perhaps sixty persons from the village and the vicinity make a daily pilgrimage of a distance of from one block to two miles from the post office, to find out whether there is any mail or not; and a hundred more persons within the circle of the office do not find it convenient to go more than once a week. One hundred or more persons each day, in all weathers, are making trips to the postoffice often at great personal inconvenience and discomfort, when a single carrier could once or twice each day make the round of the village and distribute the mail, and save the hundred a daily unnecessary tramp, collecting at the same time from the letter boxes, located at the street corners, the mail to be forwarded. A newspaper brought every day to the door of the farmer or workman, who has no one to go to the office for it, would find a thankful subscriber and light a new lamp in the household."

The Strongest And Purest.

St. Paul Minn. Globe: The official report of the Minnesota dairy and food commissioner shows the Royal Baking Powder the best in the state. The last report of the Minnesota state food and dairy commission contains the details of the state chemist's experiments and analyses to determine the strength and keeping qualities of the various baking powders. Sample of numerous brands on sale in this state were purchased and first analyzed to ascertian their leavening power. The Royal Paking Powder is shown by the test of both state analists, Prof. Eberman and Prof. Drew, to contain the greatest amount of leavening gas of the cream of tartar powders thus purchased and tested. Hence this powder is officially ranked at the head of the list.

The report attaches great importance to a series of experiments made to ascertain the character efficiency and keeping qualities of the powders. Baking powders that vary in strength or that readily lose strength before use, are unreliable and will not give even result; sbesides,it is an indication of the use in their compounding of improper ingredients. These tests were applied to a large num- of samples of different ages of the three cream of tartar powders best known in Minnesota. They show the strength or leavening power of the Royal very much greater than that of the others. The uniformity of strength of all the samples of Royal tested was remarkable. Its leavening power was practically unimpaired even in the oldest specimens. The difference in the amount of leavening gas in different samples of both the other brands was so great as to seriously impair their usefulness in baking. As much as 24 per cent. loss was found in samples a few months old. All the samples of Royal examined by Dr. Drew were reported of satisfactory strength and quality.

A Bright Young Lady

Who edits a special department in one of the best country weeklies of Minnesota was lately a delegate to a gathering of representative ladies, held at a point on "Burlington." In speaking of the connection, and the journey to and fro, she writes to her paper:

A very pleasant ride to Winona was enjoyed. which was greatly due to the superior accommodation and excellent management of "The Burlington." The conductors and trainmen were very courteous, A better route could not have been chosen; the road was smooth and the chair cars gave one almost the ease of a home. The road wound in and out in gentle curves, now along the bank of the flowing river, then dashing between tall bluffs, or running along by rippling brooks, which constantly afforned the travelers varied and delightful scenery. Before leaving the car the ladies fastened to the bell rope a neat card tied with the white ribbon and bearing the words. 'Acknowledgements of the state W. C. T. U. Convention, Winona. Sept. 1-5.' All certainly had "appreciated the kindness of 'The Burlington.'"

This route is famous from Lake Michigan to the Pacific Coast for its attention to the comfort of ladies traveling without escort. For rates, maps, and any information, call on any agent of this or connecting lines or write to W. J. C. Kenyon, Gen. Pass. Agent C., B. & N R, R,, St. Paul, Minn.

PHIL. A. KAUFER.

A STRONG GRASP.

"Eleazar's Hand Cleaving to His Sword" Serves as a Subject.

Dr. Talmage Likes an Infidel Far Better than a Namby Pamby Christian.

No Call for Women Who Stay Away Because a New Hat Is Not Done.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.—Dr. Talmage took for a text: II Samuel xxiii, 10, "And his hand cleave unto the sword."

A great general of King David was Eleazar, the hero of the text. The Philistines opened battle against him, and his troops retreated. The cowards fled. Eleazar and three of his comrades went into the battle and swept the field, for four men with God on their side are stronger than a whole battalion with God against them. "Fall back!" shouted the commander of the Philistine army. The cry ran along the host, "Fall back!" Eleazar having swept the field throws himself on the ground to rest, but the muscles and sinews of his hand had been so long bent around the hilt of the sword that the hilt was imbedded in the flesh, and the gold wire of the hilt had broken through the skin of the palm of the hand, and he could not drop his sword which he had so gallantly wielded. "His hand clave unto the sword." That is what I call magnificent fighting for the Lord God of Israel. And we want more of it.

O my friends, in this Christian conflict we want a tighter grip of the Gospel weapons, a tighter grasp of the two-edged sword of the truth. It makes me sad to see these Christian people who hold only a part of the truth, and let the rest of the truth go, so that the Philistines, seeing the loosened grasp, wrench the whole sword away from them. The only safe thing for us to do is to put our thumb on the Book of Genesis and sweep our hand around the Book until the New Testament comes into the palm, and keep on sweeping our hand around the Book until the tips of the fingers clutch at the words: "In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth." I like an infidel a great deal better than I do one of these who hold a part of the truth and let the rest go. By miracle God preserved the Bible just as it is, and it is a Damascus blade. The severest test to which a sword can be put in a sword factory is to wind the blade around a gun barrel like a ribbon, and then when the sword is let loose it flies back to its own shape. So the sword of God's truth has been fully tested, and it is bent this way and that, and wound this way and that way, but it always comes back to its own shape. Think of it! A book written 18 centuries ago and some of it thousands of years ago, and yet in our time the average sale of this book is more than 20,000 copies every week, and more than 1,000,000 copies a year. I say now that a book which is divinely inspired and divinely kept and divinely scattered is a weapon worth holding a tight grip of.

I see hundreds, perhaps thousands, of young men in this audience. Do not be ashamed, young man, to have the world know that you are a friend of the Bible. This book is the friend of all that is good, and it is the sworn enemy of all that is bad. Oh, hold on it. Do not take part of it and throw the rest away. Hold on to all of it. There are so many people now who do not know. You ask them if the soul is immortal, and they say, "I guess it is, I don't know; perhaps it is, perhaps it isn't." Is the Bible true? "Well, perhaps it is, and perhaps it isn't; perhaps it may be figuratively, and perhaps it may be partly, and perhaps it may not be at all." They dispise what they call the Apostolic creed; but if their own creed were written out it would read like this: "I believe in nothing, the maker of heaven and earth, and in nothing which it hath sent, which nothing was born of nothing, and which nothing was dead and buried and decended into nothing, and arose from nothing, and ascended to nothing, and now sitteth at the right hand of nothing; from which it will come to judge nothing. I believe in the holy agnostic church and in the communion of nothingarians, and in the forgiveness of nothing, and the resurrection of nothing, and in the life that never shall be. Amen!"

What have we suffered in comparison with those who

or were burned, or were chopped to pieces for the truth's sake? We talk of the persecution of olden times. there is just as much persecution going now in various ways.

Oh how much others have endured for Christ, and how little we endure for Christ. We want to ride to heaven in a Pullman sleeping car, our feet on soft plush, the bed made up early so we can sleep all the way, the black porter of death to wake us up only in time to enter the golden city. We want all the surgeon to fix our hand up. Let them bring on all the lint and bandages and all the salve, for our hand is hurt, while Eleazar does not know his hand is hurt. "His hand clave unto the sword."

As I look at Elezar's hand, I come to the conclusion that he has done a great deal of hard hitting. I am not surprised when I see that these four men—Eleazar and his three companions—drove back the army of Philistines, that Eleazar's sword clave to his hand, for every time he struck an enemy with one end of the sword, the other end of the sword wounded him. When he took hold of the sword, the sword took hold of him. Oh, we have found an enemy who cannot be conquered by rose-water and soft speeches. It must be sharp stroke and straight thrust. There is intemperance, and there is fraud, and there is gambling and there is lust, and there are ten thousand battalions of iniquity, armed Philistine iniquity. How are they to be captured and overthrown? Soft sermons in morocco cases laid down in front of an exquisite audience will not do it. You have got to call things by their right name.

We have got to expel from our churches Christians who eat the sacrament on Sunday and devour widows' houses all the week. We have got to stop our indignation against the Hittites and the Jebusites and the Gergishites, and let those poor wretches go, and apply our indignation to which need to be dragged out and slain. Arabs here, Herods here Jezebels here. The massacre of the infants here. Strike for God so hard that while you slay the sin the sword will adhere to your own hand. The whole tendency is to refine on Christian work. We keep on refining it, until we send apologetic word to iniquity we are about to capture it. And we must go with sword silver-chased and presented by the ladies, and we must ride on white palfrey under embroidered housings, putting on the spurs in only just enough to make the charger dance gracefully, and then we must send a missive, delicate as a wedding card, to ask the old black giant of sin if he will not surrender.

Women saved by the grace of God and on glorious mission sent, detained from Sabbath classes because their new hat is not done. Churches that shook our cities with great revivals sending around to ask so demonstrative worshipper if he will not please to say "amen" and "hal lelujah" a little softer. It seems as if in our churches we wanted a baptism of cologne and balm of a thousand flowers, when we actually need a baptism of fire from the Lord God of Pentecost.

But I see in the next place what a hard thing it was for Eleazar to get his hand and and his sword parted. The muscles and the sinews had been so long grasped around the sword he could not drop it when he proposed to drop it, and his three comrads, I suppose, came up and tried to help him, and they bathed the back part of the hand, hoping the sinews and muscles would relax. But no. "His hand clave to the sword." Then they tried to pull open the fingures and to pull back the thumb; but no sooner were they pulled back than they closed again, "and his hand clave unto the sword." But after a while they were successful, and then they noticed that the curve in the palm of the hand corresponded exactly with the curve of the hilt. "This hand clave unto the sword."

You and I have seen it many a time. There are in the United States today many aged ministers of the gospel. They are too feeble now to preach. In the church records the word opposite their name is "emeritus," or the words are, "a minister without a charge." They were a hero race. They had small salaries, and but few books, and they swam spring freshets to meet their appointments. But they did in their day

A MIGHTY WORK FOR GOD.

They took off more of the heads of Philistine iniquity than you could count from noon to sundown.

I had in my parish in Philadelphia a very aged man who in his early life had been the companion and advisor of the early presidents, Madison and Monroe. He had wielded vast influence, but I only knew him as a very aged man. The remarkable thing about him was his ardor for Christ. When he could not stand up in the meeting without propping, he would throw his arm around a pillar of the church, and though his mind was partially gone, his love for Christ was so great that all were in deep respect and profound admiration, and were moved when he spoke. I was called to see him die. I entered the room, and he said: "Mr. Talmage, I cannot speak to you now." He was in a very pleasant delirium, as he imagined he had an audience before him. He said: "I must tell these people to come to Christ and prepare for heaven." And then in this pleasant delirium, both arms extended, this octogenarian preached Christ and told of the glories of the world to come. There, lying on his dying pillow, his dying hand clave to his sword.

It was in the front room on the second floor that my father lay a-dying. It was Saturday morning, 4 o'clock. Just three days before that day my mother had left him for the skies, and he had been homesick to join her company. He was 83 years of age. Ministers of the Gospel came in to comfort him, but he comforted them. How wonderfully the words sounded out from his dying pillow: "I have been young and now am old, yet have I never seen the righteous forsaken, or his seed begging bread." They bathed his brow, and they bathed his feet and they succeeded in straightening out the feet; but they did not succeed in bathing open the hand so it would stay open. They bathed the hand open, but it came shut. They bathed it open again, but it came shut. What was the matter with the thumb and the fingers of that old hand? Ah! it had so long clutched the sword of Christian conflict that "his hand clave unto the sword."

I preach this sermon

AS A TONIC.

I want you to hold the truth with ineradicable grip, and I want you to strike so hard for God that it will react, and while you take the sword, the sword will take you.

You noticed that the officers of the Northern army a few years ago assembled at Denver, and you noticed that the officers of the Southern army assembled at Lexington. Soldiers coming together are very apt to recount their experiences and to show their scars. Here is a soldier who pulls up his sleeve, and says: "There I was wounded in that arm," and shows the scar. And another soldier pulls down his collar, and says: "There, I was wounded in the neck." And another soldier says, "I have had no use of that limb since the gunshot fracture." O my friends, when the battle of life is over, and the resurrection has come, and our bodies rise from the dead, will we have on us any scars of bravery for God? Christ will be there all covered with scars. Scars on the brow, scars on the head, scars on the feet, scars all over the heart won in by the battle of redemption. And all heaven will sob aloud with emotion as they look at those scars. Ignatius will be there, and he will point out the place where the tooth and paw of the lion seized him in the Colisseum, and John Huss will be there, and he will show where the coal on that day when his spirit took wing of flame from Consance. M'Millan, and Campbell, and Freeman, American missionaries in India, will be there—the men who with their wives and children went down in the awful massacre at Cawnpore, and they will show where the dagger of the Sepoys struck them. The Waldenses will be there, and they will show where their bones were broken on that day when the Piedmontese soldiery pitched them over the rocks. And there will be those there who took care of the sick and who looked after the poor, and they will have evidences of earthly exhaustion. And Christ with his sacred hand waving over the sacred multitude, will say, "You have suffered with me on earth; now be glorified with me in heaven." And then the great organs of eternity will take up the chant, and St. John will play: "These are they who came out of great tribulation and had their robes washed and made white in the blood of the lamb."

But what will your chagrin and mine be if it shall be told that day on the street of heaven that on earth we shrank back from all toil and sacrifice and hardship. No scars to show the heavenly soldiery. Not so much as one ridge on the palm of the hand to show that just once in the battle for God and the truth, we just once grasped the sword so firmly, and struck so hard that the sword and the hand stuck together, and the hand clave to the sword. O my Lord Jesus, rouse us to thy service.

It May Have Been a Graphic Tale.

Mrs. Bilkins had left the table and the two men had settled back for a smoke. It was the first visit that Browne had paid the Bilkinses in several years, and of course there was plenty to talk about. Bilkins had a story to tell his bachelor friend, and after he had gotten well under way it ran something like this:

"As I was saying —— You don't mind having the children in here, do you? No, of course not. I knew you wouldn't. Well, we figured it out that we were twenty miles from the nearest habitation, and it was snowing like ——Excuse me! Put your nut-pick a little farther on the table. Mabel will get it and hurt herself with it. The snow, you see, was blinding, the horses were nearly worn out, and the mercury was rapidly falling. To add to the horror of the situation——look out! Albert is reaching for your plate. That's right. Put it in the middle of the table. Have you ever been lost in a snowstorm? No? Well, we were. There was no question about that. And I want to tell you that it's a mighty serious thing. We knew that we were off of the trail, but we were in hopes of finding it. If we didn't strike it within half an hour we knew ——Robert if you take any more nuts off your father's plate you'll get a thrashing. There was small chance of striking the trail, too. In fact we might have crossed it once or twice and never known it on account of—— Albert has your fruit-knife. It's dangerous to leave them near the edge of the table. Well, we struggled on for ten or fifteen minutes more, and then we just about gave out. The snow and the cold made it unbearable. Then one of the horses gave out, and ——There! Mabel has grabbed your cigar. I knew she would. Don't cry, Mabel. Run to mamma, and she'll fix the burn."

Then, after Mabel had left and quiet was again restored, Bilkins suggested:

"You don't seem to be interested."

"O, yes, I am," was the reply.

"In what?"

Politeness Sometimes Pays.

A good looking young lady with a pair of seashore shoes on was crossing City Hall Park the other day with the strings of one shoe flipping and flopping about with every step she took, writes M. Quad in the N. Y. Evening World. She knew all about it, and she realized that every man she met was looking right at the foot, but she hadn't the nerve to stop and tie the strings. The situation caught the eye of a small bootblack who crossed her path, and he did the right thing at the right time and in the neatest manner. Running up to her he dropped on his knees and placed his box for her foot. She placed it there and he gathered up the strings, deftly tied them into a double bow knot, and doffed his cap and bowed like a little gentleman.

"You are the smartest boy in New York!" she said, as she reached for her purse, and the next instant he was galloping down the walk and shouting:

"Oh! Jim, look-a-here! Made a mash and struck half-a-dollar all in a minit!"

A Life-Long Disappointment.

"What a sad face she has. It looks as if it might have a woful life history."

"It has. She was disappointed in love when young. She has never been able to get over it."

"Did he jilt her, or die, or what?"

"Neither; he married her."—Detroit Free Press.

REFORMING DRUNKARDS.

How a New York Business Man Secures Efficient Clerks.

Business men of enterprise frequently have novel ideas, says a letter from New York, but probably the most curious mode of conducting trade that has come to light even in this city of odd freaks, is that adopted by a wholesale dealer in notions and dry goods on Broadway near Howard street. His name is known to dealers in that line of goods throughout the country, and his store is probably one of the largest of this kind, but, as his secret was confided to me under promise not to reveal his identity, I feel bound to withhold it, at the same time vouching for the correctness of the story.

My friend became acquainted with this merchant's peculiar idea through a business intercourse. A week ago he entered the store, intending to purchase some dry goods that had been advertised very cheap. As he stepped over the threshold he was accosted by a clerk who at once attracted his attention. He was a man past middle age, with a shabby genteel air that was very striking. His face was rather bloated, his eyes blinked and were red, his hands trembled, and his breath was redolent of strong drink. My friend was amazed, and looked around to see if some salesman of more prepossessing appearance would not present himself. To his intense suaprise, of the half dozen clerks in sight all had the same air of dilapitated gentility. Before he could collect his senses the man beside him had begun to inquire as to the particular style of goods he desired to see. His voice, although harsh and discordant, had some pleasing and attractive qualities, and it was evident that his understanding of the business was thorough.

A few days later he met a person who was thoroughly acquainted with the proprietor of the dry goods store, from whom he learned the secret of the salesman's appearance. It seems that the merchant conceived the idea of employing as salesmen as many broken-down merchants in his line of business as he could find. He discovered that most of the ex-employers who had failed, and whom he could expect to secure at such salaries as he was willing to pay, were men whose downfall was mainly due to intemperance.

He discharged all the sober clerks and employed a new batch of broken-down merchants. Then he gathered them all together and told them the conditions under which they would have to work. He first reminded them of their failing and told them that they would have to curb it.

"Now, gentlemen," he is alleged to have said, "it is not to be presumed that, inasmuch as you could not keep sober when your own business interests were involved, you will be able under ordinary circumstances to stop drinking because I want you to do so. Even if you don't get drunk during business hours your bats at night will probably incapacitate you for work the next day. The only way to prevent that is to keep you from temptation even when you are not actually at work. That will be for your interest as well as for mine. What I am going to do is this: I am going to fix up rooms for you on the top floor where you can stay at night and sleep. I will have your meals sent from a restaurant near by and you will be fed at my expense. You must not leave this establishment except with my permission, but I will see that you get plenty of fresh air and out-door exercise. I will pay you well and will expect you to do your utmost to sell my goods just as though you were yourselves the proprietors. At any time you want to quit, of course you only need say so. In order to satisfy your cravings for drink, you will receive regular rations of whisky every day. By gradual diminishing the quantity, the grip it has upon you will be loosened. You can save money and with perseverance you will be able to give up your bad habits and once more become respectable members of society.

Nearly all acceded to the conditions. Some have dropped out since by breaking the rules, for the proprietor is very strict, but most of them have observed them faithfully. A few have been able to overcome their passion and have started in business for themselves again. As they drop out their places are filled by new men, as far as the proprietor is concerned, he is said to have found it a profitable plan.

A Cyclone's Work.

Ex-Gov. Gilman, of Minnesota thus relates an incident of a cyclone that passed over St. Cloud, Minn., a year ago: "Some things occurred during that cyclone that swept across my farm a year ago last spring that have never been told. I was in St. Paul at the time and went up to St. Cloud expecting to find my house blown into the river. In this I was happily disappointed, but there were evidences that the cyclone had swept through my back yard, and the next morning when I went out to look around I heard a bleat coming out of the air, and, looking up, I saw a likely-looking Jersey calf hanging in the branches of a large pear tree. I summoned my hired man, and together we managed to get the calf down and found that he was all right, with the exception of his forehead. This part of the calf's head was bleeding, and upon examination we found that a portion of a glass dish that looked like the bottom of butter-dish had been blown into the forehead and was fixed there so tightly it was impossible to remove it. The animal didn't seem to suffer from the wound, and, washing the blood out of its eyes, we gave it some cut hay and oats, which it ate ravenously. Up to the present time the calf has continued to grow strong and fat, and it has become a curiosity in the neighborhood, for through the bottom of the glass dish the workings of the calf's brain can be plainly be seen. The wound around the edges of the glass has healed, and the animal walks around like a bull's-eye lantern. One curious fact in the case is that I have never been able to discover where the calf came from, but it was probably picked up by the wind in its rush and brought down, and hung up in the tree. Yes, cyclones are very funny things, but I don't want any of them to monkey around my premises, if you please."

The Worst of the Argument.

Said one of the girls about to graduate: "I've been writing my essay every Saturday since the term began, and now I have sixty-seven pages and the subject is only half exhausted." "What's the subject?" "The intellectual superiority of women over men." Good gracious! does it take 134 pages of manuscript to prove that?" "Why, yes." "Then you must be on the wrong side of the question."

Lightning as a Photographer.

A Lincoln, Neb., young girl was dressing in her room during a thunderstorm when her pug dog ran in. She clasped it to her bosom and a flash of lightning instantly killed it. She was horrified to find that an image of her dog had been photographed on her bosom. There seems to be no way of removing the picture, which gives every shade, color, and wrinkle of the canine form.

NUMEROUS UNIFORMS.

The Many Suits Possessed by the Prince of Wales.

The full total of uniforms—naval, military, civil, and miscellaneous, including, of course, those pertaining to the various orders of knighthood the Prince of Wales hold—cannot be less than a hundred, says a London writer. This may seem a startling fact to some of my readers, but I may remind them that of military, militia, and volunteer uniforms his Royal Highness has or should have thirty-nine. Most people are aware that he is Colonel-in-Chief of each of the three regiments of Household Cavalry, of the Tenth Hussars, and of the Rifle Brigade, but it is not so generally known that he is also honorary Colonel of eleven East Indian regiments, including the Sixth Bengal Cavalry, the Guides Corps, and the second Ghoorkhas. Of commissions in militia and volunteer regiments he holds seventeen in all, and, as every one knows, he is honorary Colonel of the Pomeranian Hussars (Blucher's Own), as well as a Field Marshal in the German army. Among the Prince's more miscellaneous uniforms may be reckoned those attaching to his office as a Lord of the Isles (if, indeed, this office entails even this sartorial responsibility), High Stewart of Plymouth, Doctor of Music, Grand Mason of the Freemasons, Elder Brother of Trinity House, Commodore of five yacht clubs, President of the Society of Arts, Governor of Charterhouse, and Bencher of the Middle Temple. Thus it will be seen how easily a three-figure total may be reached; and granting that in a liberal percentage of cases no uniform has ever to be worn there must be still a sufficient number of varied costumes left to constitute in themselves a very large wardrobe and one needing the most systematic care in the method of its arrangements. I have doubts, however, whether the suggestion of a kind of Mme. Tussaud's devoted entirely to the exhibition of the Prince of Wales in his various uniforms would be a popular show, even if admirably carried out. It is well to remember the moral of the saying, "Toujours perdrix," which, being translated freely, means it is possible to have too much even of a good thing.

A Telephone for Writers.

One of the most beautiful of modern inventions—it remains to be seen whether it is as useful as it is beautiful—the instrument devised by Mr. John Robertson for the transmission of writing by electricity, was exhibited at the American Exhibition in London. Out of the top of a box, which is about the size of an ordinary dispatch box, protrudes what has the appearance of a stylographic pen. This, however, is not a pen, but the handle of the "transmitter," and its lower end is fixed to a light brass perpendicular bar. Any motion given by the hand—you hold it just like a pen—to the handle of the transmitter is communicated by this bar to two series of carbon disks contained within the box, and, after various adventures among magnets, etc., is carried again to the top of the box, where it is reproduced exactly by a small ink-holding pen, whose point rests on a white paper tape. A clock-work apparatus pulls this tape along at a gentle pace, and after a little practice you find that it is quite easy to move the handle of the transmitter so that the pen shall write legibly on the moving tape. Now, whatever is written on the tape before you is written simultaneously a mile off, or it may be fifty miles off, on a similar tape by a similar instrument at the other end of the wire. The instrument is very compact and apparently efficient, and as it is quite silent there seems no reason why a reporter sitting in the House of Commons could not straightway write off his report of a debate to be instantaneously read off in Printing House Square or Northumberland street. A name will be wanted for this machine. Perhaps the "wire-writer" will do.

His Wife Was Managing Editor.

Down from a secluded mountain village comes this story of one of the ornaments of the Athenian pulpit. The Rev. Mr. —— is enjoying his vacation with his family in one of the most quiet and charming villages in New Hampshire. The other day he was out on an all-day fishing excursion with his young sons and a visiting layman from town. During his absence his wife received a large parcel of new papers and magazines from town, and, according to her habit, began marking as she skimmed the articles she thought would be most helpful to her husband. He returned at night successful. He and his friend had caught plenty of fish and were in as high spirits as the boys who went with them. After supper they sat down to look over the mail, and the visiting brother saw the plentiful pioneer pencil-marks of the minister's wife.

"How's this?" he asked, jokingly. "Aren't you allowed to read anything except the things Mrs. M—— picks out for you?"

"No," answered Mr. M——. "Not a thing. My wife is the managing editor of my pulpit, and she is getting ready for the fall campaign."

"And while you go fishing——"

"She stays in and looks after my interests and keeps her watchful eye on the Devil," said Mr. M——, quickly.

Teach the Children How to Sew.

Every girl and boy should be provided with a box, in which there are buttons suited to their clothes, thimble, needles and thread. Many boys learn to sew on buttons, but will not use a thimble; if they accustom themselves to its use when they begin, it will become necessary, as it is, to rapid and safe sewing. Without it the second finger receives many wounds from the head of the needle, which is discouraging to a beginner, and uncomfortable to any one. A few points given at a very early age will be sufficient, such as: The old threads must be picked off the cloth or out of the button, if there are any. A needle that will easily slip through the eyes of the button should be chosen, and thread of suitable color and strength; thread the needle and draw the ends of the thread together, and tie a knot on the end. Sew through the holes of the button three times two ways, so that a cross, or letter X, will be made when it is done; fasten on the wrong side with three back stitches, and cut the thread. Children can be taught to sew on buttons perfectly when they are 6 years old. There are many grown people who never learn to sew them on properly.

The New Postage Stamps.

The new series of postage stamps soon to be issued will vary very little from the designs now in use. The vignettes will not be changed at all, and the portraits on the new stamps will be identical with those now in use. The chief object of the change will be to make the new series of adhesive stamps conform to those embossed upon the envelopes now used from the department. To this end there will be several changes in the colors employed. The most noticeable of these will be the 2-cent stamps. This is now brown. In the new series it will be of a milori green.

SOME CURIOUS RELICS.

Fabulous Prices Paid for Genuine or Imported Curios.

In Calvin's day there was enough "wood of the true cross" to load a ship, and there is scarcely an object connected with sacred history which is not multiplied in a very embarrassing manner.

The saints are as freely duplicated, and even triplicated. St. Sebastian's body is in four different places and his head in two others. St. Philip must have had three feet, if all the relics associated with his name are to be accepted as authentic, while two different monasteries exhibit the skull of St. John the Baptist—one when he was a young man, the other after he was advanced in years and wisdom. In these days we are less reverential over memorials of the great, though the care with which Burns' and Shakespere's houses are preserved is a proof that the hero-worshiping element is not eliminated from the spirit of the nineteenth century. The chairs in which the literati sat fetched, we are afraid, rather disappointing prices at Mr. Goodwin's sale. Yet Antwerp preserves with pious care the seat in which he painted the immortal "Descent from the Cross" and Kammerherr Schemekel paid 58,000 florins to become the possessor of the ivory arm-chair which Gustavus Vasa presented to the city of Lubeck. This was expensive enthusiasm compared with that evinced when the prayer book of Charles I., which he had used on the scaffold, changed owners for no more than £100; though on the other hand, it was small compared with the 561,000 francs which were disbursed for the coat which Charles XII. wore at the battle of Pultowa.

The tooth of Sir Isaac Newton sold for £750, to be set in a ring; and when the bodies of Heloise and Abelard were removed to the Petits Augustins an Englishman is said to have offered 100,000 frances for one of Heloise's teeth. The hat which Napoleon wore at Eylau sold for £500. It may, however, says the London Standard, be noted that these prices were paid at a period when the "curio" rage was more virulent than now. A few years ago Thorswaldsen's hair-brushes went for a good deal less than an "old song" fetches at a London book sale, though the great sculptor is almost a demigod among his countrymen. Blucher's sword scarcely brought the price of old iron, and it is painful to remember that the white kid nether garments of George IV. were disposed of as a "job lot."

WILD HORSES.

Bands of These Animals in the Mountains of Nevada.

We have all read of wild horses on the plains, but there are not many people who know that their are several bands in the mountains of Nevada. Such is nevertheless the case, and at least three bands have been seen in that country along the high hills near the Lander line. There is one group of seven or eight animals that is seen every summer on the very top of Shacknaty mountain southwest of Cortez. An old stallion is the kingpin of the herd. He is essentially a polygamous brute, as nothing but mares are ever seen in his company, and he is said to guard them with a fatherly care. Last summer some of the cowboys out in that section gave chase to the band for two or three days. When hotly pursued the old stallion was seen to drop in the rear and vigorously bite the others to make them accelerate their speed. He allows none to escape, and if a tame animal falls in his way it is taken along also. In a remarkably short time a domestic animal becomes as wild as the rest. These wild horses look especially large and fine when climbing the precipitous mountains. They can go anywhere a mountain sheep will go. But they do not bear close investigation. When caught they are found to be not much larger than a big greyhound. The boys out on the old Shed Wells ranch corraled one last season after a two days' hard drive over the hills. The poor little thing was not worth the effort. It completely broke his heart and constitution to be brought under the rules of civilization. As the boys expressed it, "He wasn't worth a short bit," and they now pay no attention whatever to the wild horses of Shacknasty mountain.

The Fatal Toothpick Habit.

A recent autopsy in Chicago revealed the fact that deceased had contracted the habit of swallowing toothpicks, which indigestible implements had perforated his vital organs in such a loathsome and unlooked for manner as to lead to his demise. This fact is of vital interest to all thoughtful persons who have hitherto looked upon the toothpick as a harmless edible to be consumed in great quantities after each meal, and hereafter when a bowl of toothpicks is served as a last course the waiter may justly be regarded as having evil-minded designs. Of the two varieties of toothpick the quill is considered by medical authorities as the more pernicious, and Chicago surgeons declare that no man with more than forty goose-quill picks can expect to come out first in a mince pie struggle; and if while in this feeble condition he continues to absorb toothpicks gastric fever and peritonitis may suddenly call him away. Little by little science is enlightening the mysteries of nature. The toothpick must go.

Novel Application of Pulp.

A novel application of paper pulp has recently been discovered and consists in the production of organ pipes from that material. The origin of the industry is somewhat curious. Crespi Rigtuzzo, the curate of a little Italian village, was desirous of supplying his chapel with an organ, but as the commune was too poor to find the necessary funds, he and an engineer of the name of Colombon hit upon the idea of making the pipes of paper pulp, which gave such satisfactory results that the patent has been sold in Germany for £2,500,

A Mecca for Suicides.

Druid Hill Park, in Baltimore, seems to be the mecca for suicides. Prof. Devon, who killed himself there recently, is the twenty-second person who has killed himself in the park since it was opened to the public.

THE HOHENZOLLERN'S RING.

A Curious Superstition Concerning The German Royal Family.

From the "Life of Emperor William:" One morning of the winter of 1865, in the Adjutant's chamber of the royal palace, the royal treasurer, Mr. Geisling, entered, carrying a long, doubly sealed package. The address on the package, written by King Frederic William IV., was in effect: "I have opened this package in the presence of my sister Louise of the Netherlands, have taken cognizance of its contents, and then sealed it again with my seal, thereupon restoring it for safe keeping to the Prince Wittgenstein." A few days afterward there was found accidentally in the manuscript collection of the Berlin Royal Library, in an old folio volume, entitled "Alchemy of the Old Electors and Various Other 'Super stitiosa,'" a notice that King Frederic II., at the commencement of his reign, had, among various other things, also found a little box containing a ring with a black stone and a slip of paper by King Frederic I., on which was written about the following: "This ring has been given to me by my father, of blessed memory, upon his death bed, with the remark that so long as this ring shall be preserved in the house of Brandenburg this would not only grow but increase and thrive visibly." Another notice, referring apparently to the same ring, said: "It is said that a princely person has brought in a large toad and set it upon the Princess, who was at that moment in child's labor; this toad vomited forth a golden ring, mounted with one diamond and two rubies. This ring is still at present transmitted to the first born of the house to the memory and intended good fortune and preservation of the owner."

Rumor has connected this ring with one said to have been drawn from the dying King Frederic William II.'s finger by the Countess Lichtenau. This says that luck left the Hohenzollerns in 1806, when the Countess possessed herself of the ring; she was treated harshly and unjustly by Frederic William III., and when finally She returned it in 1813 for a life pension, luck accompanied it. When she took the ring from the dying King's finger he exclaimed, feebly: "Her den ring" (return the ring; it was overheard by other persons, and the wiley Countess said the King had expressed a desire for herring.

The late Emperor William was thoroughly free from mysticism, yet, from his manner of talking on this subject, he appeared as if he placed implicit faith in the power of the ring credited to it by the accompanying notices and remarks by his ancestor.

CORBAIT.

A Curious Insect Which Is Found Only in Rocky Mountain Streams.

In the streams of the Rocky mountains the fisherman use a bait that is not generally known in the United States. It is called corbait. It is a kind of water grub, and in natural history it furnishes, like the butterfly, some very interesting evidence in favor of the doctrine of evolution, while the close of its existence might point a moral for preachers and philosophers of opposite turns of mind. At the sandy bottom of a clear and sluggish stream it first appears as a little maggot rolling along with the current. As it rolls portions of the finest sand and atoms of wood stick to it, until it acquires a complete overcoat. With the gluey substance which it has acquired in nature's store it cements the sand and little particles of wood around its body with marvelous skill. Its head and front parts are somewhat like a fly or little beetle, as it has strong claws. When its overcoat or house is finished, with all the modern improvements, it stops rolling and begins to crawl on the bottom against the current until it reaches a rock, under which it takes refuge from trout and other enemies. There it remains in peace and security all through the summer. In winter it closes up the front and only door of its cabin and doubtless sleeps the sleep of the just. When spring returns and the water begins to get warm it manages to thin down the walls of its habitation, from which, of course, the water is already expelled, until it becomes sufficiently buoyant to bear the tenant to the surface. Then it floats along, looking like an insignificant fragment of a rotten twig. Suddenly under the rays of the sun the upper portion of this affair bursts open. It is a boat now, with one little passenger aboard—a beautiful green fly, known by trout fishers as the "green drake." Perfectly safe in his little vessel, this green drake enjoys the sunshine. He scratches his wings with his toes, combs his hair with his fingers, and takes some long and lazy stretches. Then, as if struck with a new idea, he raises his wings, hesitates a moment to consider his future career, and at last flies off to make new acquaintances in another sphere of life. Unfortunately his want of experience on wings is too often fatal to him. His ability and propensity to walk upon the water seem to be of questionable utility; but he gets there as if to look down upon the miserable world from which he came. Lost in reverie and serene happiness, he floats along carelessly and then suddenly disappears in the jaws of a hungry trout, where his variegated career ends.

Post-Nuptial Comments.

First maiden: "They say he really has an income of thirty thousand a year and will have more when his father dies. Only think of it!" Second maiden: "Don't you envy her? Marguerite always was a lucky girl anyhow. How I envy her!" Third maiden: "And I! They say, too, that he isn't a bit stingy, and Marguerite can run up all the milliners' and dry-goods bills she plerses and he won't say a word about it. Only think! Fourth maiden "How perfectfuly delightful! I wonder if he is a club man? But I dare say he is; and how charming for Maggie if he is. Dear me! How lucky some girls are" Fifth maiden: "Oh don't mention it! it makes me green with envy when I think of it! How she will dress! And there's a cottage at Bar Harbor, too, and——" Sixth maiden: "Oh girls! I can't keep still any longer. I've such news for you! All those stories are utterly without foundation in fact. He really and truly has only ten thousand a year, and would you, would you believe it? she actually married him for love!' First, second, third, fourth, and fifth maidens: "How—perfectly absurd!"

THE FUTURE OF AUSTRALIA.

A Statistician Estimates That It Will Have 125,000,000 Souls in a Century.

Statistics that have been prepared by competent authorities in Australia show that in the year 1891, when the regular census will be taken, there will be in the Australian colonies of Great Britain not less than 4,000,000 inhabitants. Judging from the growth of Australia by the progress that has already been made, and by similar increases that have taken place in the United States, the statisticians of the antipodes assert that in a century from this time Australasia will have a population of 125,000,000 souls; that is, there will be upon this southern continent and its adjacent islands a population greater than is now found on the continents of North and South America. Of course, at that time the increase in population in other parts of the world will have gone on. Russia will then have more than 200,000,000, Germany, 100,000,000, and the United States at least 250,000,000 people. But even allowing for gains made elsewhere, says the Boston Herald, it is evident that at that time Australia will be looked upon as one of the great nations of the world, for it hardly needs to be said that long before that time the colonial ties that bind the colonies to the mother country will have been broken and the Australians will have only those sentimental connections to attach them to England that they will share with the members of the widespread English-speaking race.

In judging of the future of a great division of the world it is necessary to take into account its industrial and political as well as its natural advantages. Politically considered there is not much difference between the condition of the Australian colonies and the condition of our American States. They are in all respects self-governing communities; in fact, if anything, they are more free than an American commonwealth, for neither New York nor Massachusetts can raise a revenue or protect its local industries by a tariff tax, while Victoria and New South Wales can cut into each other's trade as much as they please by hostile tariff legislation. However, the colonists are the sufferers by such liberty of action, while we are the gainers by having complete free trade over almost a continent.

In the social condition of the Australian people, in the absence of hereditary rank and the opportunities afforded of acquiring such positions as can be gained by wealth, intelligence, or general ability, there is a close similarity with the people of the United States. They have also the same industry and persistency, the same readiness to take advantage of opportunities presented whereby wealth can be produced with the least amount of labor. Perhaps no better illustration can be given of this than the great success that has attended the raising of sheep in these colonies, particularly in that of New South Wales. That one colony has a larger number of sheep than all of the United States, and the sheep-growers, although they pay to those in their employ as high wages as are given to those in the employ of sheep-raisers in the United States, find not the least difficulty in getting wool, sending it to London, and selling it at prices which would be considered ruinous by those in this country who are engaged in a similar business.

HIS MEMORY WAS WONDERFUL.

How a Street-Car Conductor Astonished a Visitor from the Country.

An old lady from the country is visiting friends in the city who live on the South side. Sunday being a fine day the old lady took a ride on a West Madison street car and returned from the trip fully impressed with the idea that she had met a man possessed of a most remarkable memory, says the Chicago Times.

"We went along the track quite a ways," she said, "when the conductor put his head in at the back door and called out 'Curtis!' He said it rather sharp-like, I thought, and a half-drunken man who was asleep in one corner of the car got up and staggered out.

"At the next stop he shouted 'May!' and the most stylish young miss I ever saw got up and walked out as unconcernedly as if her father had called her. Pretty soon we stopped again and the conductor yelled 'Ann.' A young woman with a baby in her arms smiled at the conductor and got out. I was just clean beat but didn't say anything. It wasn't long till he opened the door and said 'Elizabeth!' in a voice loud enough to be heard through the car. A silver-haired lady, old enough to be his grandmother, got up and left the car without seeming to notice that he had called her by her first name. I did, though, and if he had taken any familiarities with me I'd have given him a piece of my mind. It's a wonder he didn't holler Betsy at her.

"At the next stop he told 'Ada' it was time for her to get off. Ada was a little tot of a girl about 5 years old, and he picked her up in his arms and carried her out. A little farther on he jerked open the door and yelled 'Loomis and Sheldon!' and two men, who were talking earnestly in one end of the car, got up and left. Then in a short time he called for 'Paulina' and an old maid lowered her eyes and blushingly left us. And that's the way he rattled off names all the way up and back. It's not unusual for folks to be well acquainted in country towns, but goodness me! what a memory a man must have to know the name of everbody in a city of 800,000 people."

Spinach.

If properly cooked, spinach is one of the best of spring dishes. Select it before the leaves are too large; cut out the roots. Wash and cook 15 to 20 minutes, in water containing a teaspoonful of salt to a gallon of water. Drain it in a colander, and when quite dry, chop it fine, season with salt and pepper; melt two tablespoonfuls of butter in a spider, stir into it one of flour, and let it cook, but not scorch, then turn in the spinach, and, when it has cooked two minutes, add half a cupful of milk. It will be done as soon as the milk is scalding. Have ready a couple of hard-boiled eggs, and when the spinach is taken up in the dish, cut these in slices and cover the dish with them. Spinach prepared thus is a much more palatable dish than when cooked with pork as is often done.

AN OLD SLAVE'S SECRET.

He Bequeaths His Knowledge of a Silver Mine to His Son.

Silver mining upon an extensive scale is to be begun in the mountains near Richmond, Va., as soon as the weather will permit. In connection with the beginning of this industry there is an interesting and unusual story. Almost from the period of the first settelment of the country there has been a popular belief that a silver mine of considerable richness existed somewhere in the middle mountains, but although searching parties have tramped over almost every foot of the territory, beginning their operations long before the war, no trace of the vein was ever found by white men, About 1858, however, a slave named Gaiter accidentally found the silver-bearing ledge, and took the story to his master, with the offer to reveal the location if he could be assured of the freedom of himself, wife, and son. The master, thinking it was only a ruse on the part of the colored man to get away to the North, refused to take any stock in the alleged discovery, and the John Brown raid, together with the outbreak of the war, caused the silver legend to be completely lost sight of. Gaiter and his family moved to Mount Pleasant Pa., where he died a few years ago, but not before he had confided his secret to his son Henry Henry made a number of secret trips to the secret mine and secured a considerable quantity of the metal. A short time ago he visited this place and entered into negotations with local capitalists. They were so impressed with his story that they consented to purchase a large tract of wild land in the mountains a few miles south of the town. As soon as that was accomplished they entered into an agreement with Gaiter to give him one-fourth of the net proceeds of the mine. This Gaiter assented to, and the old slave's son is now there overseeing the preparation of the papers. The company formed has ample backing, and active operation will be begun as soon as the agreements are completed and signed. Gaiter has with him a silver brick and a number of specimens of ore taken from the mine, and the rock is rated at an exceptional richness. The affair has created much excitement since it became public.

BARBERING.

Some Points About Shaving—Results of Shingling the Hair.

Henry Mayer, who runs an underground barber shop in Park Row and who has a wide stock of information on other subjects besides that of barbering, said to a New York Evening Sun man:

"The old custom of lathering a man's twice during shaving process has practically fallen into the soup. It still prevails, however, with a few barbers who cling to obsolete customs. A single application of lather is sufficient for all practical purposes, moistening the skin with a sponge being sufficient for the second application of the razor."

"Why is soap lather used upon the face?" Asked the writer.

"Because nothing else will answer the same pupose. Experiments have been made from time to time with glycerines and oils, but none of them would answer. Shaving soap has just sufficient alkali to neutralize the effect of the natural oil in the hair and to take away the stiffness from the beard."

"Why is it, Mr. Mayer, that so little hair oil and unguent are used nowadays?"

"The late war destroyed the necessity for hairdressing compounds a rather curious way," was the reply.

"Previous to the war of the rebellion, it was the almost universal style to wear the hair long, sometimes even reaching down to the shoulders. For the sake of convenience and also for comfort, the soldiers had their hair cut short, thus promoting both comfort and cleanliness. After the war this style became popular. It proved destructive to a very profitable part of the barber's business. Formerly barbers derived a large income from the sale of hair oils and pomades, but in this degenerate age this business is reduced to more labor in handling the scissors and razor."

The President at Billiards.

President Harrison and Elijah Halford played a game of billiards at the white house recently. The billard room at the executive mansion has not been used since the days of Arthur. Mr. Harrison is very fond of the game and easily defeated his secretary. "It was not a diplomatic defeat, either," said Halford, afterward, "for I should not have hesitated an instant about beating the President. We played a carrom game, and, while neither of us could cope successfully with professionals like Schaefer or Slosson, still it was interesting for both of us from start to finish. I may do better next time if I get odds, but I don't think I can play the President even up.

The Docter Needed Counsel.

The Medical Gazette alleges that the following letter was received by a physcian from a man whom he knew, practicing medicine and desiring counsel, "dear Dock I have a pashunt whos physical sines shows that the wind pipe has ulcerated off and his lungs have dropped down into his stumick i have given him everry thin without effeckt his father is welthy honable and influenshal as he is member of assembly and god nose I don't want to loose hym what shall i do ans by return male. Yours frat."

The Poet Shelley's Boats.

Whenever Shelley found a pool, or even a small puddle, he would linger near it, and, twisting a morsel of paper into a boat, would anxiously watch the fortunes of the frail bark. "It is astonishing," writes one of his early friends, "with what keen delight he engaged in this singular pursuit. So long as his paper lasted he remained riveted to the spot, fascinated by this peculiar amusement; all waste paper was rapidly consumed, then the corners of letters, next letters of little value."

Want Wives.

Almost every day there are men at Castle Garden who assert that they are in search of and willing to marry any bright and intelligent immigrant girl who pleases their fancy.

THE SHOSHONE CANAL.

A Movement to Conquer a Big Desert in Idaho Territory.

"In the great valley of the Snake River from a few miles beyond Boise to Shoshone and beyond," said Charles C. McPherson to a San Francisco examiner reporter, "are from 3,000,000 to 4,000,000 acres of arable land that will, if things end as they now indicate, be shortly transformed into a garden."

Mr. McPherson is an old and wealthy resident of Boise, the capital city of Idaho.

"This stupendous acreage," he continued, "is at present a desert. But there are a hundred times as much water in the Snake river as would irrigate it. So the legislature, in connection with the Oregon Short Line, is making a great move to get some of this water out of it. What is proposed is a great canal, known as the Shoshone canal, which will convey water on this at present arid empire and convert it into from 12,750 to 25,000 farms of 160 acres each.

"Now each of these farms would have at least five persons on it, which would make a population of about 100,000 persons, and probably as many as 125,000, with about 25,000 dwellings. In place of Boise having 5,000 people or less at the present time she would jump to 30,000 or 40,000.

"So stockmen, Idaho legislators, and the Oregon Short Line have set to work to get $2,500,000 from the national government to run this canal. The government owns the land, but it is worth nothing without the water. Private parties have not got the money to do the work with, and if they had the government owns the land any how, so it could not be undertaken, at least not just now.

"In order to formulate a plan on which to work the legislative committee appointed to look it up and W. B. C. Allen, the Shoshone representative of the Oregon Short Line, have invited the whole legislature to go over to Salt Lake and see what has been done there and gain statistics about it. The whole Wasatch valley is to be viewed and the most trustworthy data gained. The whole country thereabout has been made to 'blossom as the rose,' solely by the aid of a comparatively small amount of water from the Jordan river Originally the land was covered with greasewood and sagebrush. It was uneven and as ugly and forbidding as the Sahara ever was.

"Almost everybody knows at least a little about how it has been transformed and that the valley is dotted with towns, with 40,000 persons at Salt Lake, 12,000 at Ogden, and from 1,000 to 6,000 in each of twenty others.

"Well, the Shoshone or Snake country is a bigger one by far, with just as good and much smoother land. So this is why all Idaho is now on the watch about the canal project. There is plenty of grass for stock in the mountains around during the summer, but in winter there is none, and as there is no hay the only thing is to water the valley and raise alfalfa, clover, timothy, and redtop. But this, after all, is the smallest of reasons, important as it is.

"The great reason is, of course, 'to subdue a desart and let it be peopled by the tens of thonsands who are ready now to move upon it. Such a movement to help dig the big Shoshone canal would double the population of Idaho in two years and make a fine state of it in short order."

A MULE THAT STAYED.

He Remained too Long in the Path of the Locomotive.

There were half a dozen of us on the platform at Calera, Ala., waiting for the East Tennessee & Virginia train, when an old gray-haired mule, plodding along the highway with his head down, came to the crossing and stopped right across the track, says a writer in the Detroit Free Press.

"Peter, ar' dat your mewl?" called one negro to another.

"Yaas, dat my Jim," was the reply.

"Better go down an' scare him off dat track, den. He's boun' to git all mussed up if yo, don't."

"Dog-gone him, if he hainter got sense nuff in his head to move on, let de bullgine hit him!"

After a few minutes we heard the whistle of a locomotive, and the same negro spoke again:

"Better go down dar, Peter. Dat Jim mewl hainter gwine to dodge."

"Didn't I say let him alone! He hainter blind or deaf."

In two or three minutes we saw a wild locomotive coming around the curve, and as soon as the engineer saw the mule he began tooting. The animal never even looked up. He stood there in the sunshine as if asleep.

"Dat Jim mewl's a goner fur shore!" exclaimed the negroes as we hurried to the best point of observation.

So he was. The pilot slid under him, lifted him ten feet high, and he was flung aside with a crash which broke him all to pieces. We went down to the spot, but he was dead.

"Jist like I tole ye, Peter," said the one who had been anxious.

"Yaas, but I couldn't sense it. De idea of a mewl standin' right dar' till he was knocked off beats me all around. Dog gon yer! Went an' got yourself busted up to git shet of corn-plowin,' didn't ye! Dat's jist like yer, but yer can't spite me any! I kin sot around ebery day now an' de old woman can't say a word agin' it!"

Lively Horse Trading.

Captain Ed Cox, the well known livery man of Atlanta made some successful trades the other day, according to the Macon Telegraph. Early in the morning he paid $87.50 for a horse, later he traded the horse for a mule, receiving some boot. Then traded the mule for another horse, again getting money in the bargain. In the afternoon he traded that horse for the one he had bought in the morning. At night he had his first purchase and $42.50 in money.

Beauty in the Sand of the Sea.

The fine compact sand which gives such firm footing upon the beach at Anastasia, Fla., is scarcely half an inch in depth. Below it lies a bed of loose, brkoen shell. Under the microscope a pinch of this debris from the ocean bottom is transformed into a myriad of grottoes, towers and minarets, built of glittering crystals and gems of every hue.

HOW TO PROPOSE.

A Few Hints from a Wise Writer on an Important Subject.

Don't be too sudden about it. Many a girl has said "no" when she meant "yes," simply, because the lover didn't choose the right time, and pop the question gently.

Take a dark night for it. Have the blinds closed, the curtains down and the lamp turned most out. Sit near enough to her so you can hook your little finger into hers.

Wait until the conversation begins to flag, and then quietly remark:

"Susie, I want to ask you something."

She will fidget about a little and probably reply:

"Yes?"

After a pause you can add:

"Susie, my actions must have shown—that is, you must have seen—I mean you must have been aware that—"

Pause here for awhile, but keep your little finger firmly locked. She may cough and try to turn the subject off by asking you how you liked the sermon, but she only does it to encourage you. After a pause you can continue:

"I was thinking as I was coming up the street to-night, that before I went away I would ask you—that is, I would broach the subject nearest my—I mean I would know my——"

Stop again and give her hand a gentle squeeze. She may make a move to get away or she may not. In either case it augurs well for you. Wait five minutes and then go on.

"The past year has been a very happy one to me, but I hope that future years will be still happier. However, that depends entirely on you. I am here to-night to know—that is, to ask you—I am here to-night to hear from your own lips the one sweet——"

Wait again. It isn't best to be too rash about such things. Give her plenty of time to recover her composure, and then put your hand on your heart and continue:

"Yes, I thought as I was coming here to-night how happy I'd been, and I said to myself that if I only knew you would consent to be my—that is, I said if I only knew—if I was only certain that my heart had not deceived me, and you were ready to share——"

Hold on—there's no hurry about it. Give the wind a chance to sob and moan outside among the trees. This will make her lonesome, and call up all the love in her heart. When she begins to cough and grow restless you can go on.

"Before I met you this world was a desert to me. I didn't take any pleasure in life, and it didn't matter whether the sun shone or not. But what a change in one short year. It is for you to say whether my future shall be a prairie of happiness or one long and never-ending pathway of thistles. Speak, dearest Susie, and say—and say that—"

Give her five minutes more by the clock and then add:

"That you—you will be—that is, that you will—be mine?"

She will heave a sigh, look up at the clock and round the room, and then as she slides her head over your vest pocket she will whisper:

"Henry—I will."—London Tid-Bits.

Confederate Navy Buttons.

The buttons adopted by the confederate navy have been very highly prized in the south since the war as relics, and have, where they could be obtained, been used as vest and cuff buttons. Owing to their scarcity they have been in very active demand, but they now seem destined to become a drug on the market, as a resident of Norfolk, W. Va., has received a letter from the firm in London which made them during the war, stating that they still have the dies and can furnish the buttons in any number.

No Crippled Chinamen.

"Did you ever see a deformed or crippled Chinaman?" asked a gentleman of another yesterday. There was a negative reply and the questioner continued: "I don't think you ever will. If a Chinese child is born deformed it is made way with as soon as possible. Just how the babe is killed I do not know, but it is never permitted to live. You may travel all over the world and you will never see a crippled Chinaman. When an accident befalls one of them he is made way with, too. This is a part of their religion, and they adhere to it closely."

"August Flower"

Perhaps you do not believe these statements concerning Green's August Flower. Well, we can't make you. We can't force conviction into your head or medicine into your throat. We don't want to. The money is yours, and the misery is yours; and until you are willing to believe, and spend the one for the relief of the other, they will stay so. John H. Foster, 1122 Brown Street, Philadelphia, says: "My wife is a little Scotch woman, thirty years of age and of a naturally delicate disposition. For five or six years past she has been suffering from Dyspepsia. She became so bad at last that she could not sit down to a meal but she had to vomit it as soon as she had eaten it. Two bottles of your August Flower have cured her, after many doctors failed. She can now eat anything, and enjoy it; and as for Dyspepsia, she does not know that she ever had it." ⊖

THE NEWS.

Official Paper of the City.

The Crops.

During the past three weeks the condition of the weather was cause for every individual in the Red River Valley to await with abated breath the evil results which alone could be told by the thresher. Now that Jupiter Pluvius has drawn in his sprinkler and the hum of the thrasher is heard from the time the crow kaws in the morning until the whippoorwill flaps his spotted wings late at night we see the golden Number One Hard rolling into the measure in almost as good condition as before the rains. Reports haye gone out disastrous to this Valley but it only remains for each member of the staff to pencil the truth to the world that the great crop of the Red River Valley has been saved. There is more wealth to the square foot in this section than in the same territory of any other farming country in the world.

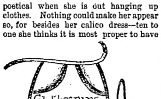
At first it was reciprocity with Latin America, later with Germany, now with Italy and soon with France. When the present administration shall have succeeded in a reciprocal trade with all nations with which trade is desirable, we suppose it will be in order for some republican genius to declare the word free trade obsolete and the sooner it is done the better.

Unless the National Republican convention is held in Minnesota—to enliven the spirit of the backsliding granger—to enkindle the fire of devotion and political love which so long burned in the breasts of those despised yet acceptable loyalists who last fall deserted their masters, we feel certain the state will be lost. By all means bring the convention to Minneapolis.

When the greatest achievements of a party sink into insignificance before a generation of newborn Americans, when it is proven that their greatest acts were the result of the aid of individuals whose progeny today forms a strong factor of an opposing party—when the glories of the past have received their just reward—when the inconsistencies of the present are chucked down the throats of the voters—when a few men endeavor to control the masses, is there any cause for wonder at the delapidated condition of the G. O. P? Is there any wonder that the campaign of '92 has already begun?

A Clothespin Apron.

Woman does not look in the least poetical when she is out hanging up clothes. Nothing could make her appear so, for besides her calico dress—ten to one she thinks it is most proper to have the ugliest prints that can be bought for her work dresses—and her sunbonnet or old straw hat without any trimming, her mouth is generally filled with the knobby ends of clothespins. To dispose of the pins make a clothespin apron, a short square or rounded piece of unbleached muslin about fifteen inches long, cut a trifle rounded to fit without any gathers. An upper piece is cut to lay over it, fitting it exactly except at either side near the top, where the cloth is cut away in a curve, leaving space each side to put the hand in easily. Bind these curves with turkey red, and then lay that piece of cloth over the other and bind, so as to leave that side out. A band, with stout buttonhole and button, completes the convenient apron. If one wishes it to be more fancy a simple drawing of a pile of clothespins or a clothesline and post, with the folds of a garment or two, can be sketched in pencil or stamped on the front and worked with red cotton.



FOR CLOTHESPINS.

Water That Changed Color.

When workmen were engaged in the tunnel of the Daniel Webster mine, in Virginia City, Nev., at a depth of 300 feet beneath the surface, they struck a "flow" of water of very strange character. It boiled up through the floor of the mine, and in the flickering light made by the miners' lamps presented an almost blood red appearance. After flowing for a few yards down the floor of the tunnel it was again swallowed up by a crack or seam—not, however, until it had turned to a dark blue color and began to smell like creosote. Miners who tasted it said it was the most disagreeable dose they had ever taken in their lives. On the skin it left dark brown stains. Samples of it taken from the first opening, bottled and sent to the surface had a rich burnt senna color. Exposure to light had the same effect upon it that air had—turned it to a dark blue color.—Detroit Free Press.

The Invention of Spectacles.

The honor and credit of pointing out the benefit of glasses to aid defective vision belongs to Roger Bacon, who lived from 1214 to 1292. Spectacles were actually invented in the year 1280, the man who conferred this great blessing on suffering humanity being Alexander Bpinia, a monk of Pisa who died in 1313.—St. Louis Republic.

HIS SECOND CAMPAIGN

ficultness of his task, went straight to success.

Ellis had made fast friends of all the state officials, and through them had forwarded his interests in a hundred desirable ways. He went among the leading men of various towns and neighborhoods, and by force of personal magnetism, a charming voice and taking manners, built up a following that served his turn where money and mere business knowledge would have failed.

Julian was not a little surprised to find that even in Jacksonville Ellis' name was upon the lips of all the pushing capitalists and land traders. At Ocala and Tampa he made the same discovery. From Gainseville, in the heart of the orange groves, he wrote to Mr. Largely. In the letter was the following very striking sentence:

"We shall have to give everything up or make terms with this man Ellis."

One day Ellis read in a Jacksonville daily newspaper a paragraph that set him to thinking as he had never thought before. It disclosed to his quick understanding the whole of Edgar Julian's mission to Savannah and Florida. He read and reread this pregnant statement: "Mr. Edgar Julian, a distinguished railway attorney of Chicago, is in the city, stopping at the Duval House. It is understood that he represents some Chicago capitalists in connection with Mr. Roosevelt, of Savannah, and that he is here with a view to making it lively for those who expect to control the lines into the orange region. Our friend Colonel Frank Ellis would do well to keep a weather eye out for the bearings of this new craft."

Mr. Largely telegraphed to Julian: "Make no terms. We'll crush him. He's got no backing."

A few days later Mr. Roosevelt and Mr. Largely went to Jacksonville, arriving on the same day that brought Sir Edmond Kane and his party.

The presence of such a number of railway magnates, including a member of the British parliament and a German baron, was blazoned forth to the world by the clever newspapers of the city.

Edgar Julian, Mr. Largely and Mr. Roosevelt had a meeting and conference with Sir Edmond Kane and the Baron Wertheimer, but no arrangement was reached. Then Mr. Ellis appeared and sought an interview with the distinguished foreigners. They listened to his eloquent description of his schemes, their bearing upon the future development of Florida, and the rich returns that capital invested therein might soon expect.

No sooner had he appeared in the city than the daily papers were full of flattering notices; the leading citizens called upon him; attention was withdrawn from the distinguished foreigners.

"Are you going to capitulate to this smooth tongued tyro?" exclaimed Mr. Largely, half growling, half taunting, as he and Julian stood on an upper veranda of their hotel and saw Sir Edmond Kane, the Baron Wertheimer and Mr. Ellis drive away together in a carriage.

Julian did not answer immediately. The question had struck him like a blow in the face.

"He's no railroad man," continued Largely, shrugging his stout shoulders and laying his hand heavily on the young man's arm; "you can see that at a glance; and yet, I suppose, the most brilliant lawyer in the country will go down before him."

"If you refer to me when you speak of the most brilliant lawyer in the country, I can say that I shall not go down before Mr. Ellis. At present he seems legally in possession of certain rights and franchises, stocks, bonds, certificates of landed donations and so on, of which he cannot be dispossessed"——

"That is not the point," interposed Largely, lifting his calculating eyes to Julian's clouded face. "It is not a matter of law, it is a question of personal influence. He has captured these foreigners."

"Yes, he is lying to them in the most approved southern fashion."

"He is using his gifts to some purpose, then," brutally replied Largely.

"Yes, to some purpose," sneered Julian.

"And what do you think of this draining and transpeninsular canal scheme that Ellis is talking of?" inquired Largely in a more earnest tone.

"Frankly, there may be a great deal in it, though I doubt it. But all the same it will serve Ellis a grand turn. It gives his faculty for charming exaggeration the fullest field for action."

"You rate Ellis too low, I fear," Mr. Largely quietly remarked.

"No, you mistake me. I would not detract from his genuine genius, but you will soon discover what is already demonstrated to me, that he is utterly untruthful and unscrupulous. He is a bold, gifted, ill trained adventurer."

"But his lack of training seems not to have discovered itself in his operations down here," Largely answered.

Julian made an impatient gesture as if to shake off a disagreeable feeling.

"In your telegram to me the other day, I think you spoke of crushing him, or something of the sort," he presently remarked.

Largely laughed aloud; then——

"At that distance it seemed easy," he generously replied; "but upon a nearer inspection I see some difficulty."

It was Julian's turn to laugh. He had felt the difficulty all the time.

"Aren't you getting almost too conscientious for a first class railroad lawyer, Julian?" Largely put this question bluntly with his cigar turned up until it stood almost parallel with his nose.

"Perhaps."

"I believe it."

"You know the remedy?"

"No."

"Get you a lawyer who is not too conscientious."

"Oh, the deuce! Now, seriously, Julian, I've a plan which I believe would knock these fellows higher than a kite if properly carried out."

"Your plan, I presume, is one not meant for a tender conscience to direct," suggested Julian.

Largely winced and laughed.

"It would be a deadener, all the same," he replied. "Success is what we came down here for."

Edgar Julian was a strong instance of the northern conscience. His convictions had all the purity and something of the frigid quality of ice.

Mr. Largely represented the money making north, earnest, conscienceless, godless, but honest by the gauge of Wall street or the Chicago board of trade honesty. When he heard of some poor fellow getting tangled and choked, he lighted a cigar and said, "He ought to have had better luck; let him bite again!" He had come up and out from the people, the herd, by beating and banging right and left. He presently turned to Julian, and in a tone of cool inquiry said:

"What is the legal result if one railroad corporation consolidates with another, and the two take a new name as a new corporation?"

"There would be a merging of the corporate existence of both original bodies into the new body," replied Julian.

"I know that; but what would become of lands and other subsidies granted to the two original corporatians, upon condition that their roads were to be built within a certain time?"

"It would depend much upon the original stipulations."

"Well, to put the case exactly, suppose that certain private persons have granted the right of way and large landed donations to a railroad corporation, incorporated under a certain name and having a certain line, the said right of way and donations being granted under the express contract that said corporation is to build over a certain line within a specified time. Then further suppose that said corporation, after getting a deed to said landed donations and right of way, proceeds to merge its corporate existence in that of another corporation, and takes a new name and commences to build over a line different from that specified in the contract: what is the legal remedy?"

"I doubt if there is any," said Julian "but equity might afford relief."

"Well, the equitable remedy, then?" inquired Largely.

"Perpetual injunction, perhaps."

"Would a court enjoin the further building of the road?"

"It might if irreparable injury were threatened to the grantors of the donations and rights of way."

Mr. Largely turned upon his heel, walked to the veranda railing and leaned over, resting his elbows on the top. After awhile he turned again to Julian and said:

"Come to my room and write me bill, a bond and an affidavit for a restraining order."

He went at once to his room, followed by the mystified lawyer.

"Now make these papers watertight," he added; "leave names and dates blank so that they can be inserted to suit any case."

Julian spent the rest of the day preparing most elaborate papers of the kind desired. After he had finished he turned to Largely and said:

"May I ask what in the world you want these for?" tapping the folded documents.

"I have no definite need for them just at this moment," was the evasive reply; "but I don't know how soon I may put them to work."

Julian did not pursue the matter further. He rose to go.

"Julian," said Largely, his voice cutting dully through the air, "you don't care to help wreck three or four promising railroad companies, I reckon?"

"No, I should not know how to begin. If you will excuse me"——

"You are excused," interrupted Largely dryly, "you and Roosevelt both. You are too sentimental for my purposes. I guess I can manage this little affair alone."

Next day, without disclosing his plan to either Julian or Mr. Roosevelt, Largely was for several hours in close consultation with a firm of able Jacksonville attorneys.

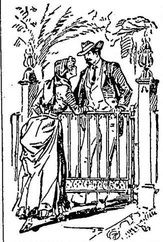
He returned to the hotel and joined Mr. Roosevelt and Julian at supper. He was now in excellent spirits. He joked freely and laughed a good deal.

"I feel as though something was going to happen," he said, "and not happen to me, at that."

CHAPTER XV.

BY MOONLIGHT.

Colonel Talbot became a frequent visitor at Roosevelt place, and his marked attentions to Rosalie might have attracted some notice from one less wrapped up in the young girl's happiness than Aunt Marguerite. As it was, however, almost every day saw him spend at least an hour in her company. He did not dream of being in love in her. He felt perfectly secure, knowing that he would marry Miss Fain within a few months; but he was perfectly conscious, all the same, that a sweet power was drawing him deeper and deeper into the rosy atmosphere that surrounded this dear mysterious mountain maid.



"He will kill you if he gets the chance."

One evening, a short time after Edgar Julian's departure for Jacksonville, Rosalie sat alone on the Roosevelt veranda, lightly thrumming on her banjo, and singing broken snatches from one of the little French songs her father had taught her, when Colonel Talbot's baritone joined in. He had come through the little side gate and up the steps without attracting her attention.

She turned toward him, smiling sweetly, rising to greet him, still singing. When they were seated he begged her to go over the little ditty again. Their voices rose together in strange accord, and seemed to go away side by side up into the realms of moonlight. She felt the touch of strength his presence gave to the scene, and it was a very pleasant and satisfying thing to sit there beside him. It delighted Rosalie to have him readily falling into her moods and sharing her whims. She liked him all the more because she knew he was Miss Fain's lover. In her simplicity she felt that the man who was going to marry her best friend was in a position to make him quite dear to her.

Colonel Talbot was leaning his head close to hers as they sang. They were both unaware that a tall, dark man had stopped in the street, just beyond the courtyard wall, and was looking and listening through the gate.

The man clutched a slat of the gate as if to rend it, then turned and walked away with his very blood on fire.

Colonel Talbot, as the singing came to an end, took the banjo from Rosalie and said:

"Let us go walking—this splendid moonlight makes an enchanted world of the city. I want to show you the loveliest spot under the sky."

"I shall have to ask Aunt Marguerite first," she answered. "If she says I may go, I shall be glad to take the turn. I have been indoors all day."

When she returned she had a light blue scarf over her head, and her face beamed the more witchingly from the contrast. A few bright locks of her hair curled over her broad forehead.

"We are not going serenading," she said, taking the banjo and putting it on a chair; "aunt says I may not be gone longer than a half hour."

Rosalie hung lightly on Colonel Talbot's arm, feeling a deep sense of security, mingled with a girlish consciousness of the romantic possibilities of the situation. It must be remembered that she was fresh from the reading of stories full of knights and troubadours, of princes in disguise, and of lady loves for whom men gladly faced death. If she dreamed of a lover, she made him, in some sort, a champion sans peur et sans reproche. She would marry him who would win her by personal prowess directed by the fervor of romantic love; his nature must be lofty and his aims pure; he must be a Launcelot in bravery, a Bayard in honor. Many young girls have such a dream; but with Rosalie it was a hereditament, a part of her nature's fiber.

Talbot nestled her arm closer to his side. They now and then passed low stoops where groups of people were enjoying the balmy breeze and the moonlight. He felt a keen satisfaction in thus having this fresh young girl all to himself, and it thrilled him to feel her light touch on his arm.

"But where is that lovely scene you were going to show me?" she demanded, just as they met a tall man, who, with a wide brimmed hat slouched over his face, was leisurely strolling in a direction opposite to theirs.

"Why, that—that was Mr. Ellis, was it not?" she added almost in a whisper.

"I believe it was," he replied; "I could not see his face."

"But I thought he was in Jacksonville," she murmured.

He felt her arm quiver a little, and her voice was disturbed, as if with a pleasurable emotion. He felt a responsive pang leap through his own breast at the thought of any man save himself causing that tender flutter.

"We shall reach the spot I spoke of in a few moments now," he said, unconsciously quickening his pace and drawing her rapidly along.

At length they came to where a street had been temporarily walled across to prevent travel in it during the erection of some public improvement. Here Talbot paused, finding their further progress barred by the wall across the street.

"I suppose we shall have to forego the pleasure I promised," he said; "it would be a long way around."

"I think we might better go back, anyway," said Rosalie, "the half hour is already quite gone, I fear."

"Oh, no," exclaimed Talbot, "it is impossible. We haven't been ten minutes coming." He looked at his watch, holding it in a spot of moonlight.

Rosalie had turned about and he could do nothing more than turn also. They were both quite surprised to find that the man they had supposed to be Ellis had evidently followed them. He was standing or rather he was in the act of turning away, not fifty feet from them.

Talbot and Rosalie looked at each other inquiringly as Ellis, if it was he, walked diagonally across the street at a rapid pace, soon hiding himself among the trees of a little park.

"Surely that was not Ellis!" said Talbot in a half suppressed voice; "he would not act so strangely."

"Let us return at once," said Rosalie with a shudder. A sudden sense of danger had almost overpowered her.

"Never fear," said Colonel Talbot; "no doubt the man means no harm; but if he were a robber he would not attempt anything in this part of the city."

She clung more closely now, and in a shaking voice urged him to take her home quickly. He thought her excitement the mere timidity of a young girl. If he had known all that she knew he would not have wondered at her emotion.

On their way back to the Roosevelt mansion they talked little. Rosalie hung heavily on his arm. When they reached the little gate he opened it; she passed through, and suddenly turning faced him in great excitement.

"Watch as you go home," she exclaimed in a sharp whisper; "he will kill you if he gets the chance." Her excitement and solicitude thrilled him strangely.

"Oh, there's no danger," he replied in a voice hoarse and unsteady. He had not taken ten paces when he heard the click of the gate latch, and then Rosalie called, in a low, thin voice, "Colonel Talbot!"

"Here," he answered, turning about.

"Do not forget to be careful. There is great danger."

He slowly strode toward his home, driving out of his mind Rosalie's words of warning. Suddenly a man confronted him. He stopped short.

"Is that you, Colonel Talbot?" said a voice, deep and husky, that he did not recognize.

"Yes, sir; what do you want?" he responded, gripping his cane and making ready to defend himself.

The figure moved, passing across a fleck of moonlight. Talbot saw the face and instantly remembered it. The next moment something struck him on the head, a dull, heavy blow, and he fell upon the ground still and senseless. The figure stooped over him and hurriedly but coolly searched his pockets, until a paper was found, which it carefully examined, as if to be sure of its identity, then rapidly walked away.

The next morning the servants brought to Roosevelt place a rumor that Colonel Talbot had been found in the street dead, murdered by some unknown person. When the papers were brought in they contained a full account. Colonel Talbot was not dead, but had been knocked senseless by a blow from a sandbag or some such instrument. His condition was extremely critical. It had been impossible, so far, to restore his consciousness, and no clew to the perpetrator of the foul deed had been discovered. The whole thing was veiled in mystery. No robbery had been committed. The colonel's magnificent gold watch and seal, and his pocketbook, containing a small sum of money, were left undisturbed on his person. He was without enemies, so far as the reporters could discover, and not the slightest reason for his assassination suggested itself, save that it was darkly hinted that political intrigue might have led to it. A certain carpetbag candidate for congress, who had been beaten mainly by Talbot's exertions, was none too good, so the papers stated, to have done the deed, seeing that in his own state, Kansas, he had once been convicted of cow stealing!

The blow fell heavily on Mildred Fain. As days and weeks passed by, with no change in Talbot's singular condition, she grew thin, and her face wore the look of one who has little left to care for. Rosalie witnessed her distress with a sympathy deepened and strangely colored by the knowledge she carried. She had told no one what she knew about the matter, and this secrecy preyed upon her. No doubt she would have told Mrs. Roosevelt had it not been for her aunt's deepseated prejudice against Ellis. Then, too, circumstances had rendered the young man's guilt a matter of mystery, if not of serious doubt, in her mind. No one else seemed to suspect him, and in fact his presence in the city on the night of the crime was contradicted by his being on the day previous at Jessup, a town many miles south of the city, where he had an important meeting with railroad friends.

Rosalie often felt an impulse toward writing to Ellis, but quite as often she recoiled from the thought. She sometimes longed to see him and hear what he would say to the dreadful accusation; then she would start and tremble at the idea of talking with a murderer. The poor child—for in experience she was scarcely more—could do nothing save brood over this strange dark subject by day and dream of it by night. Mildred Fain came often to see her, and they aggravated rather than softened each other's distress.

Mrs. Roosevelt quickly noticed her niece's trouble, and after a little thought attributed it to a tender feeling on her part for Colonel Talbot. It would have pleased Aunt Marguerite very much, if Rosalie must marry, to see her become the wife of a representative southerner like Talbot. Of course she was not informed of his engagement with Miss Fain, as it had not become public, and he was wealthy, of good family, handsome and fascinating. But Aunt Marguerite was too shrewd a woman of the world to venture any meddling. She shrank from contemplating such a thing as Rosalie leaving her, even to marry a low country aristocrat, and she was afraid to have the subject of love considered between them, for fear that if once the thought got started it might never stop.

So Rosalie was left to bear the burden of her suspicions, her doubts, her fears, her hopes, all alone. It was a great load for a bright, innocent, unsophisticated mind to be weighted with. It could not wholly drive out the gayety and sprightliness; it did not blot the roses and dimples from her cheeks, nor did it dim her eyes; but it hung like a cloud on the horizon, all the time threatening to overcast her whole sky.

State of Minnesota, county of Polk—ss.

In Probate Court, Special Term, October 6th, 18

In the matter of the estate of Anton Suttner, deceased:

On reading and filing the petition of Fred Gesswein, agent for Mary Suttner administratrix, setting forth the amount of personal estate that has come into his hands, the disposition thereof, and how much remains undisposed of; the amount of debts outstanding against said deceased, as far as the same can be ascertained; the legacies unpaid, and a description of all the realestate, excepting the homestead, of which deceased died seized, and the condition and value of the respective portions or lots thereof; the persons interested in said estate with their residences; and praying that license be, to him granted to sell all of the real estate described in said petition. And it appearing, by said petition that there is not sufficient personal estate in the hands of said agent for administratrix to pay said debts, the legacies or expenses of administration, and that it is necessary for the payment of such debts, legacies or expenses, to sell all of said realestate.

It is therefore ordered, that all persons interested in said estate, appear before this court on Monday the second day of November, 1891, at 10 o'clock a. m., at the probate office in Crookston in said county, then and there to show cause (if any there be) why license should not be granted to said administratrix to sell all of the realestate of said deceased as shall be necessary to pay such debts, legacies and expenses.

And it is further ordered, that this order shall be published once in each week for three successive weeks prior to said day of hearing, in the Red Lake Falls News, a weekly newspaper printed and published at Red Lake Falls in said county.

Dated at Crookston the 6th day of October, A. D. 1891. By the Court,

oc15-29 C. M. Benson, Judge of Probate,

Mortgage Sale.—Default having been made in the payment of the sum of fourteen hundred twenty-five and 33-100 dollars, ($1425.33) which is claimed to be due at the date of this notice upon a certain mortgage, duly executed and delivered by Thomas Perusse and Delima Perusse, his wife, to Josephine Majeau, bearing date the 2d day of June, A. D. 1886, and, with a power of sale therein contained, duly recorded in the office of the register of deeds in and for the county of Polk and State of Minnesota, on the 18th day June, A. D. 1886, at 9:30 o'clock a. m., in book T of mortgages, on page 224 thereon, and no action or proceeding having been instituted, at law or otherwise, to recover the debt secured by said mortgage, or any part thereof. Now,

Therefore, notice is hereby given, that by virtue of the power of sale contained in said mortgage, and pursuant to the statute in such case made and provided, the said mortgage will be foreclosed by a sale of the premises described in and conveyed by said mortgage, viz:

The northwest quarter of section three in township one hundred and fifty north, of range forty three west in Polk county and state of Minnesota, with the hereditaments and appurtenances; which sale will be made by the sheriff of said Polk county, at the front door of the court house, in the city of Crookston in said county and state, on the 14th day of November, A. D. 1891, at 10 o'clock a. m., of that day, at public vendue, to the highest bidder for cash, to pay said debt and interest, and the taxes, if any, on said premises, and fifty dollars, attorney's fees, as stipulated in and by said mortgage in case of foreclosure, and the disbursements allowed by law; subject to redemption at any time within one year from the day of sale, as provided by law.

Dated September 26th, A. D. 1891.

ECHOES OF THE RAPIDS

St. Joseph's church will hold a fair.

C. W. Mead will now give his full attention to the Star saloon.

Mrs. Bertha Busch takes rank as one of the best lady farmers of the state.

Curtis Wells' is a podular resort. People recognize courtesy--and low prices.

Mrs. M. Bray is still confined to bed, though her condition grows more favorable.

Mr. J. Poulliet and family yesterday moved into the north wing of the Ralph block.

W. A. Schreiter and family yesterday moved into their Kretzschmar av residence.

Mr. and Mrs. McCornack went to Euclid Saturday where the former officiated on Sunday.

Mrs. J. D. Marshall and son Drew went to St. Paul Tuesdav night where they will visit.

Miss Minnie Zaiser is still at Grafton attending her sister Mrs. John Pratt who is now convalescing.

Fred Zeh returned from West Superior yesterday morning where he had been the past six months.

Mrs. N. Holberg returned yesterday from an extended visit to relatives in the southern part of the state.

Roads are drying fast. The full fall trade will not be felt however till frost stops plowing, setting farmers at liberty.

Rev. Jirah McCornack, the energetic pastor of the Presbyterian church, was last week ordained and may now perform marriages, etc.

Mrs. Pierre Bottineau took Tuesday evenings train for Osseo, Minn., summoned to the bed of her father, Mr. Peter Gervais, who is critically ill—he is 81 years old.

The new schoolhouse is about completed. This will give the South Side scholars and teachers immunity from frozen hands and feet—which the present quarters scarcely did.

The Mille Lacs Indians don't seem inclined to move. They feel that so doing will be a desecration of treasured precepts—it will be a difficulty to persuade the older members of the tribe.

Supt. Grefthen died Friday at Crookston of typhoid fever. The subject of a successor is agitating the minds of the county commissioners and there will be many aspirants. The outcome is shrouded in mystery.

Mat Skala's place on Broadway still retains its popularity, and not without reason—Mat has dexterity and tact. A full stock of wines, liquors and cigars. When in need of liquors for medicinal purposes, remember he has the best.

Edward Leveck was playing broncho Tuesday, his comrades lassoing him with a rope, one end of which secured a pony. The pony started on a jolt and Edward's energy was taxed to keep pace. The pony was caught before the boy's neck was broken--it was a lucky escape.

The Crookston Times actually believes that the G. N. will be built through Red Lake Falls— nd accidently admits it. But the statement that Jim Hill has ordered work stopped between St. Hilaire and this place is wrong. Work progresses and the stretch will be completed this fall.

The last "jail breaking" atCrookston is said to have been a free walk away, interested individuals paying the jailor so much a head for the liberty of the three prisoners. While this statement sounds be rather loose, nothing seems incredible in the instance of Polk county's jail management.

Hank Draper's thrashing outfit is putting in some great work between the rivers since the dry weather and the yield and quality of the grain is in most cases excellent. Pierre Emard (who, by the way, alwas has a fine crop) has his grain all thrashed, the yield being 31 bushels to the acre and the grade No. 1 hard. His grain was stacked.

Henry Hennemuth was appointed marshal at the special meeting of the council Tuesday night vice C. W. Mead, resigned. The election was made on the first formal ballot which stood—Hennemuth, 3; Bray 1. The other applicant was Wm. McIntosh. Mr. Hennemuth filled the office of marshal very satisfactorily the year previous.

Carload of nails and fence wire at McClatchie & Co. at bottom prices.

Whenever the Crookston papers have to pad they write up a county jail breaking the fore part of the week and invariably find the article indorsed by facts by the time they go to press.

Geo. LaBissoniere has a bad cut on his right hand which well nigh disabars him for work. The thrasher was put to work in his fields yesterday.

Tuesday while workmen were at work raising an old building at Fosston, a jackscrw slipped and let the building down. One Otto Johnson was at work under the building at the time it fell and was instantly killed. Inquest will be held by Dr. McEachran, coroner for Polk county. There is evidently carelessness on the part of some one, which will come out in the evidence at the inquest.

C. Stuhr was over from Euclid Sunday a guest of his daughters Mrs. C. W. Mead and Miss Katie Stuhr. He has made a test thrashing which enables him to estimate his crop of wheat for '91 at 21,000 bushels. He is one of the most successful farmers in the county and is constantly making additions to his already broad acres. He has introduced a new plow on his farm that will do the work of five ordinary plows with but one man to operate it.

Tom Poulliet and Tellesfore Brunelle went to Crookston Sunday. Tellesfore has secured a position in a harness shop there, while Tom has the contract for lathing the new hotel building. Tom has gained the distinction of being the swiftest lather in the state and it is a sight to see him apply his talents. There are fiteen thousand yards to be covered in the Crookston building—Tom puts on 200 a day while the ordinary workman can make but 100. He will get three cents a yard under this contract.

County Attorney Holston arrived in town Monday evening looking for three jail birds who had left the Crookston jail. He found a man already in the cooler who it was thought tallied with the description of one of those he was after—the fellow had been prowling about town and his actions, deemed suspicious, had resulted in his incarceration, though he loudly proclaimed his innocence. He had shaved himself that day and carried the razor in his pocket, but the evolution from a full-bearded to a smooth faced man was not thought sufficient disguise. Tuesday his identity was investigated and as a result he is now a free man.

Pierre Bottineau brought us those fine potato specimens Friday, which have since been on exhibition in our office windows attracting the attention of passers by. They are effective exponents of the theory that by scientific cultivation and propogation almost perfection may be attained in this as well as other members of the vegetable kingdom. Four of these potatoes weigh 13¼lbs. One measures 12½ inches in length. Mr. Bottineau raises two kinds—Burbanks and Beauty of Hebron. The former are exuberant yielders and their size is phenomenal: the latter are abundant yielders and large, having superior savory qualities. He originally sent to the Department at Washington for three pounds of seed Burbank potatoes, which he planted. There was an enormous reproduction—Mr. Bottineau said he could scarcely believe his eyes when he begun to dig them. The measures kept filling until there were ten bushels and a half.

State Superintendent Kiehle arrived on yesterday evening's train and a public meeting was held at the council room at which he was the central figure. The school question was discussed and the opinion of the superintendent expressed on the different phases of the case. The appearances here, he said, did not look as if Red Lake Falls was endeavoring to slight educational matters—in making an investigation relative to securing last year's apportionment the intent, good or bad, would be taken into consideration. In this case it could hardly be said we were lax—we had, apparently, endeavored to make up lost ground, we had this year two boards, which could not be said of any other city in the world. He thought the first board the proper one to act, though our apportionment would not be effected were the second recognized unless a protest came from us. He would advise a compromise—flop a copper and let that decide it. The law seems to give considerable margin. The schoolboard held an informal meeting after the superintendent had retired and decided to accept his opinion. The first board's report will be accordingly acted upon.

'Twould be Well—

If our sidewalks had a severe overhauling.

If the Glee Club reorganized and gave an opera.

If Ed Moran thrashed forty bushels to to the acre.

If someone would play a practical joke on Neil Crawford.

If the Presbyterians would build their new church edifice.

If the artist who painted Ovide Emard's sign had used a dictionary.

If our citizens appreciated the fact that W. A. Schreiter has the finest drug store in the county.

If this fine weather continues sufficiently long to give the farmers a chance at their fall plowing.

If St. Joseph's congregation made $2,000 at the coming fair and used it in the construction of a church edifice.

If Mike Jeffers would let nature (or politics) take its course in regard to our next postmaster and not try to force matters.

If our merchants advertised more liberally, thereby securing for the whole town all her due patronage much of which now goes astray,

If every farmer had as cheerful a story as Pat Ford, who expects to thrash 1,200 bushels of wheat and 600 bushels of oats of the best quality.

If the artesian well, or the present results of the attempt to dig one, would be utilized as far as possible. A windmill and pump could be applied and a tank to receive a supply of water. It would be a boon to suffering humanity not only on account of benefit derived but by a removal of the present eyesore.

CALLED IT OFF.

Nancy Hanks Is in No Condition to Make a Race.

LEXINGTON, Ky., Oct. 14.—The officers of the Kentucky Trotting Horse Breeders Association has just made the following announcement:

It is with regret that the association announces that Nancy Hanks is in no condition to trot and the race with Allerton is declared off. The association feels that it is due the public to make this fact known without delay, but it is with great pleasure that it can say that it has been agreed to substitute Delmarch for Nancy Hanks, the understanding between the parties owning the horses being that should Delmarch win he is to trot a match race week after next at Independence with Allerton for $5,000. Delmarch has a record of 2:11½ and holds the fastest record ever made by a stallion in a race, he and Nancy Hanks having the same race record.

Beware of Green Goods.

CHAMBERLAIN, S. D., Oct. 15.—Green goods men are at present flooding South Dakota with their tempting circulars. Yesterday's mail brought a well known Deadwood merchant a printed letter, offering him the most liberal inducements to engage in the circulation of counterfeit money. As usual the letter was unsigned, but enclosed in the envelope bringing it was a printed telegram reading "Chamois in 932," to be sent to S. R. Hall, care of John Harding, 178 East One Hundred and Twentieth street, New York city, provided the proposition was accepted. It is needless to add that the proposition was not and will not be accepted.

Woman at the Fair.

CHICAGO, Oct. 15.—Mrs. Potter Palmer addressed a large meeting in the auditorium yesterday, on the world's fair. She says it is the aim of the lady managers to present a complete picture of the present condition of women; her achievements, inventions, employment, educational courses adapted to her and the personal elements upon which the value of her work depends.

Parnellites Issue a Manifesto.

LONDON, Oct. 13.—At a meeting of Parnell's colleagues during the evening a manifesto was issued appealing to the Irish people to maintain their faction for an independent fight. The manifesto was signed by twenty-eight out of thirty-one Parnellite members of parliament.

American Cereals and Germany.

BERLIN, Oct. 14.—The North German Gazette denies that an understanding has been arrived at between Germany and the United States by which American cereals are to be admitted into Germany free of cost.

CAPITAL BREVITIES

Resume of Important Events at the National Capital.

What Is Being Done by the Executive and Other Departments.

Surgeon General Sutherland in his annual report says the number of men constantly sick was 43.71 per thousand this year and 44.13 last year. The cases of treatment of alcoholism numbered 41.73 per thousand as against 41.41 in 1889, and 56.68 the average during the previous decade.

WHO WILL BE SECRETARY OF WAR?

The president has given no indications as to his intentions with respect to the portfolio of the secretary of war. Those who engage in speculation are not so confident as they were some time since that Wallace, the author of "Ben Hur," has been chosen for the place. The friends of Gen. Louis A. Grant, assistant secretary of war, are hopeful that he may be selected by the president for the promotion on civil service principles.

POSTAL NOTES A FAILURE.

It is probable that another attempt will be made in the coming congress to make it more easy for persons to pay their debts by mail. It is conceded that there is no more security in the use of the postal note than in mailing any other form of paper money. In fact the postal note is quite generally voted a failure, and the postal money order is not apparently growing in popularity. The suggestion which will probably be considered by the postoffice department is whether cards can not be issued in the form of postal cards and to be used in the same way, which shall be money cards and be used for the transmission of fractional parts of a dollar.

SENDING MEN-OF-WAR TO CHILI.

The United States steamers Boston and Yorktown have been ordered to Chili for the express purpose of relieving the United States steamers Baltimore and San Francisco, the hulls of which are in so foul a state that they will have to be docked and it will be necessary for them to go to San Francisco for that purpose. They will start north immediately upon being relieved. The Baltimore will sail first and she will be relieved by the Yorktown, which has already started for Chili and will reach there in about fifty days. The Boston is being rapidly prepared for the voyage and will start in a few days. It is said at the navy department that it is not at all likely that any other vessels will be sent to Chili.

DEFENSE OF WESTERN LAKES.

There is reason to believe that the government contemplates providing for more efficient defense of the western lakes by a peculiar construction of the ancient techhical agreement with Great Britain. Under existing regulations with Great Britain the United States is permitted to maintain on the lakes, in addition to one warship, four revenue cutters. There is no stipulation in the treaty about the type of revenue cutter to be employed, and it is with this knowledge that Senator Edmunds opposed any appropriation for a lake cutter that did not carry with it a sufficient amount to insure the building of a desirable vessel. In the opinion of Senator Edmunds it is not an economic measure to build any vessel for revenue cutter duty of a type not available for service in time of war.

STOLE $1,800,000 OF SKINS.

Lyman E. Knapp, governor of Alaska, in his annual report to the secretary of the interior devotes considerable space to the seal islands and the seal industry. The most serious difficulty in the matter is the illegitimate slaughter of the females and the young in the open sea. There is no doubt that a most valuable industry and fruitful source of national income are in danger. More than a hundred marauding vessels have been hovering about the islands in Bering sea during the season and large numbers of skins have been taken. The steamer Danube made a special trip to the northern Pacific during the latter part of June, reaching Victoria on its return July 6 last, having on board nearly 18,000 sealskins received from some thirty-five sealing vessels which it met apparently by appointment. Those delivering their cargoes to the Danube were all British vessels. The governor estimates the number illegitimately taken during a small part of last season at from 50,000 to 60,000.

ARIZONA IN A THRIVING CONDITION.

N. O. Murphy, the acting governor of Arizona, in his annual report to the secretary of the interior, expresses the opinion that the population of the territory will reach 70,000 before the end of the present fiscal year. There are at least, he says, 12,000 Mormons in the territory engaged in agriculture and mining. The total valuation of all the taxable property of the territory is $28,270,466. This amount, however, the acting governor regards as entirely too low. The bonded debt of the territory is given as $303,000. The acting governor estimates the copper output at 30,000,000 pounds, the gold output $1,182,055, and the silver output $1,633,585. The acting governor recommends that Arizona be admitted into the Union as a state upon the adoption of a proper constitution by the people; that the school lands be made at once available; that the Apache Indians be disarmed and prohibited from using arms; that the mineral lands in the San Carlos reservation be opened for occupancy.

DEMAND FOR SMALL NOTES.

The shipment of small notes to the west is still going on from the treasury department, but Secretary Foster believes that the time for fearing a stringency has passed. The aggregate shipments of small notes since July 1 have been more than $38,000,000, against shipments during the whole of 1890 of about $34,000,000. Secretary Windom poured money from the treasury in enormous quantities last year, but most of it went to New York in payment for bonds, and the demand was smaller than this year for the movement of the crops. Secretary Foster attributes the larger shipments this year to the large crops and the fact that there has been a larger volume of circulation than there was a year ago, so that there has been more money to be offered in exchange at New York for the small notes which have been shipped from here to the western banks. While his policy has been to ship silver certificates as much as possible and to obtain gold certificates in exchange, he has also shipped legal tender notes of small denominations and some of the new treasury notes.

FOR SCHWAB AND FIELDEN.

Attorney Salomon to Appear in Their Behalf To-day at Washington.

WASHINGTON, D. C., Oct. 16.—In the Supreme court of the United States tomorrow Moses Salomon of Chicago, as attorney for Fielden and Schwab, the anarchists who were committed to the Joliet penitentiary for life at the time Spies, Lingg et al. were condemned to death for the murder of policemen at the Haymarket riot in Chicago, will file papers in two cases to secure the release of the two convicts and he will then move that the cases be advanced.

Fielden's case comes to the federal Supreme court by an allowance of a writ of error by the Supreme court of Illinois. Mr. Salomon contends in his brief that the Illinois Supreme court violated the constitutional right of Fielden when it refused to amend the record of the case which shows that Fielden was present when the sentence was affirmed, when in fact he was not present, and that the sentence of the Illinois Supreme court therefore is void, the court having no power to sentence him to death in his absence.

The case of Schwab is brought to the federal Supreme court on an appeal from the denial for rehearing by Judge Gresham. Schwab's release is asked on the ground that he is confined in a penitentiary on a commutation by the governor, and that the governor's warrant has no authority whatever for the confinement of any person in the penitentiary. Gen. B. F. Butler is associated with Mr. Salomon in these cases.

ANOTHER TASCOTT STORY.

A Demented Woman Says Her Husband Was Tascott's Partner in Crime.

BALTIMORE, Oct. 15.—A woman of unsound mind was conveyed to Bayview asylum today from her residence, No. 951 Harford avenue, says the American. She is the widow of the late Albert K. Ordway, a clothing cutter from Chicago, who committed suicide at his home, 1406 Harford avenue, on March 10 last. Mrs. Sophia Elizabeth Ordway, the proper name of the woman, claims that her late husband was the companion of Tascott, the man who is supposed to have murdered Millionaire Amos J. Snell in Chicago a couple of years ago. In the story told by Mrs. Watts, Mrs. Ordway's mother, who learned it from her daughter, the latter claims that Tascott is dead. She says she knows he was strangled to death and his body made away with by his pals. In that connection she frequently mentioned the names of Funkhouser, Marsden and Reynolds. Ordway was acquainted with Millionaire Snell, as he made a great many clothes for him and had borrowed money from him at times.

TO BUY RAIN.

Kansas Farmers Agree to Pay the Australian Ten Cents an Acre.

TOPEKA, Kan., Oct. 14.—A Goodland dispatch says that the contract by which Frank Melbourne agrees to produce crop rains in northwestern Kansas during June, July and August of 1892 was signed last night. A mass-meeting of citizens was called and a committee appointed to confer with Melbourne. The rain-maker stood by his first proposition to furnish rain at 10 cents an acre.

A series of meetings will be held in the various counties of this state for the purpose of awakening public interest. Melbourne will attempt to make a similar contract with twenty counties in Colorado, claiming that he can easily water every county in the state from one point. The irrigation companies in Colorado will fight the scheme and it will probably be fought in this state on the ground that the irrigation act does not cover a proposition such as Melbourne submitted.

Says She's Vic's Daughter.

ST. LOUIS, Mo., Oct. 13.—Mrs. Edward Charpiot, of this city, claims to have proof that she is the daughter of Queen Victoria. In an interview, she gives the record of her birth and traces her life for the past 35 years. She also claims that the Prince of Wales visited her when he came to this country. Mrs. Charpiot speaks good English with a slight French accent, and from appearances is very intelligent.

Ferninst a Sunday Fair.

WASHINGTON, Oct. 16.—The Ecumenical Methodist conference this morning adopted unanimously a petition to the United States commissioner of the Chicago world's fair protesting against the proposed opening on Sunday.

Snow in Vermont.

ST. ALBANS, Vt., Oct. 13.—Snow fell throughout the northern portion of Vermont during the night to the depth of several inches.

The sportsman is just now in clover or rather he would be were game more plentiful. He can kill any game bird, or beast, or catch any game fish to be found in the field, the woods or the streams of Iowa. Quails were the latest addition to the sportsman's list of lawful prey, and they became ripe for the picking on the first of the present month. The open season for everything will continue until December 1st, when prairie chickens receive again the protection of the law. A month later quail, woodcock, turkey and snipe can go at large with no fear of their lives except at the hands of lawbreakers.

RICH IN SILVER.

A Valuable Find on the West Superior Copper Range.

WEST SUPERIOR, Wis., Oct. 13.—There was an exodus of old-time miners, this morning, to the copper range, seven miles from this city, and the ravines of the range will be punched full of holes inside of a week by prospectors, who have been fired by discoveries made by W. C. Tonkin.

It has long been known that native copper was plentiful in the range and free silver had been found but not in paying quantities. Now Mr. Tonkin, who is an experienced miner, has unearthed a rich find. A few weeks ago a settler brought in a piece of ore 60 per cent pure and Tonkin immediately went prospecting. He returned last Monday and brought to the smelting and refining works specimens of silver ore which he found within 20 miles of the city, the assay of which proved to be exceedingly high, running 322¼ ounces of silver to the ton. It was what is known as silicious ore, free from lead or iron, and composed almost wholly of silica. At the New York quotation of 96¾ cents per ounce, this ore would be worth $312 a ton.

Mr. Tonkin claimed that the ore was taken from a vein 12 feet thick, of variable richness, but which would average 50 ounces to the ton. This, as compared with 35 ounces, the general average of the ore the smelting and refining company is receiving from Montana, may be considered exceedingly rich. The definite location of the lead he would not give, but it is known he controls a good deal of land on the range. Dozens of old settlers are bringing in large quantities of copper and silver ore for assay, and all the specimens are so rich that the hills will be full of prospecters in a day or two.

A NEW SUGAR PROCESS.

What the Alcohol Process Does—A Big Saving Effected.

WASHINGTON, Oct. 16.—Secretary Rusk has a number of samples of sorghum sugar manufactured by a new process, by which he says about 200 pounds of sugar is obtained from a ton of sorghum cane. When asked what the new process is he said:

"It is called the alcoholic process. Alcohol is mixed with the sorghum syrup and, after treatment, the former is recovered by re distillation, so that there is no appreciable loss. The sugar is nearly white and it is strong in saccharine qualities above 90 degrees. I have received a dispatch from Mr. Swenson, who has been trying the alcoholic process, and he says that about twice as much crystalized sugar per ton of cane can be obtained as can be obtained by the process heretofore in use."

Will Contest the Will.

PARIS, Oct. 13.—It is announced today that the daughters of the late Gen. Boulanger, who committed suicide on Sept. 30, by shooting himself through the head, on the grave of his mistress, in the cemetery of Ixelles, near Brussels, will contest four of the clauses of his will. It is expected that the legal proceedings will result in the development of some interesting evidence regarding the dead man's inner political and private affairs.

Fined for Sunday Work.

LOUISVILLE, Ky., Oct. 15.—At Frankfort, the court of appeals today affirmed a judgement of $900 and costs assessed by the court of Green county, against the Louisville & Nashville railroad company for violating the Sunday law by repairing its track in that county on Sunday. The court holds that the tracks could be repaired on other days.

Not Until December.

WASHINGTON, Oct. 13.—Hon. Stephen B. Elkins, who was tendered the secretaryship of war a month ago, visited the president. He will not assume the office until December.

BLOOMING OVER THE DOOR.

A cottage, all fitted and furnished,
Stands daintily over the way,
And here a young pair to housekeeping
Came promptly the first day of May;
The place seemed homelike and cozy,
The sun shone bright on the floor,
Yet one dewy evening saw them planting
A rose to bloom over the door.

Ah, how they watched over it growing,
And trained it with tenderest arts.
And swift as its bright buds unfolded,
The love of home grew in their hearts.
The husband came home in the evening,
All weary and worn from the store,
To find the wife's welcome the sweeter
For roses that bloomed o'er the door.

But they say, "love flies out of the window
When poverty enters the door,"
But against all trials and troubles
The two young hearts garnered full store,
For, when fell the hush of the twilight,
They whispered anew love's sweet lore,
Wove closer the bonds of affection
'Neath roses that bloomed o'er the door.

And when the dark days closed around them,
And poverty's wave o'erbore,
To keep the poor home how they struggled,
Where the roses bloomed o'er the door.
And now, all their "trial time" ended,
They dwell in the sunlight once more,
And love brightly gleams on the hearthstone
Where roses bloom over the door.

Ye new-mated pairs who are building
Your home-nests, now heed, I implore,
This lesson—that love lingers longest
Where roses bloom over the door.
So ye who count home more than shelter,
Plant 'ere the bright springtime is o'er—
To make home the brighter and dearer—
A rose to bloom over the door.

A FRENCH MAGICIAN.

The Comte de Saint Germain one day related that he had been on friendly terms with Pontius Pilate at Jerusalem. He very minutely described the house of the Roman governor, and said what dishes had been served at table the evening he supped at his place. The Cardinal de Rohan turned to the comte's valet, an elderly, gray-headed man with a frank, open countenance:

"My friend," he said, "I have some difficulty in crediting what your master says. That he should be 2,000 years old and have seen Pontius Pilate is rather strange. Come, tell me, were you there also?"

"I? Oh, dear, no, Monsieur," candidly replied the valet, "that was before my time. I have not, as yet, been over 400 years in Monsieur le Comte's service."

The conversation then fell on Mme. d'Esnermeuil, whereupon the Comte de Saint Germain, full of verve and prattle, disclosed the following as yet unpublished facts concerning the incident which brought about the lady's arrest and subsequent execution:

"Mme. d'Esnermeuil," said the Comte, "was the most beautiful woman in Paris. She was a widow, and very fond of me—at least I thought so. I received more than one love missive from her, and passed many a pleasant evening in her charming villa at Versailles.

"One day she sent me a very gracefully-turned epistle inviting me to a ball which was to take place the same evening at her villa. The handsome widow begged me to appear in my most elegant costumes to enhance the brilliance of the fate.

"I felt much flattered by this request, and tried my best to comply with it. You may believe me when I say I looked a trifle younger than I do now.

"I put on my apple-green dress coat, which fitted me perfectly; each button on it was a diamond worth 1,000 louis. The pearls that adorned my hat could not have been purchased for 20,000 louis. I may have represented 1,000,000 lous in jewelry. In the evening I got into my state carriage. Five lackeys attended, two leading the way with torches. We soon reached the villa of my lovely lady friend at Versailles.

"I was surprised on arriving to find nearly all the windows dark, and no appearance of a ball. I inquired of the porter if Mme. d'Esnermeuil was at home. He answered in the affirmative, and asked me to enter.

"I found the lady alone. She appeared as much amazed to see me as I was not to find company.

"'Comte,' said she, 'to what do I owe the pleasure of your visit?'

"'As invited—I come to your ball.'

"'Impossible, Comte, you have mistaken the day.'

"'I never mistake.'

"And I took the invitation from my pocket and showed to Mme. d'Esnermeuil.

"'You are right,' she said at last, 'the error is mine. Pray excuse me, Comte, and do me the honor to stay to supper with me.'

"'But you know, madam, that I never eat anything.'

"'But you drink. I have delicious Corinth wine; you must taste it.'

"The handsome widow handed me a glassful. It was not distrust—people are not suspicious when in love—but an old habit which induced me to take hold of the glass with my left hand, on the middle finger of which I wore a talismanic ring that King Schlomo—the same you call Solomon—had given me. On the under side of the ring was an abraxas or Basilidian stone, with gnostic inscription, and hardly had it touched the crystal surface than the glass was shattered into a thousand pieces.

"The precious wine from Corinth, which my lady friend had offered me, was poisoned! At once I saw as clearly through the whole thing as if I had looked into a magic mirror. But the more em barrssed the lady became the more free I felt, and the more unrestrainedly I continued to chat. I heard the rumbling of a carriage from the door. Was it my own which had been ordered away?

"Mme. d'Esnermeuil noticed that I lent an attentive ear to the noise of the wheels as the carriage receded in the distance. She said with some confusion:

"It is my old uncle who returns to Paris." I knew better. It was my carriage, which had been sent away by the lady's maid; the coachman and servants were to come for me at 10 o'clock the next morning. The lovely widow soon got so confused that she could hardly speak. I heard a noise in the corridor, followed by the heavy tread of men. Madam turned pale, and rose in a hurry to leave the room.

"'You would not leave me, dearest?' said I, without further concern.

"She stammered:

"'Excuse me, comte. My presence is required elsewhere. I shall come back presently.'

"But before she had time to leave I darted into madam's eyes a magnetic glance in which my whole power of will was at once concentrated.

"Mme. d'Esnermeuil stood transfixed, immovable as if in a cataleptic fit. I mesmerized her forehead with my hand, and she sank drowsily into an armchair.

"In this state of somnambulism I could draw from her inmost being her most secret thoughts.

"She was forced to answer all my questions.

"'Madam,' said I, 'you meant to poison me with your Corinth wine?'

"'Yes, I did, it contained prussic acid.'

"'And what next, having failed in this?'

"'I shall have you murdered.'

"'By whom?'

"'By my servants.'

"'Are your servants ready for the aggression?'

"'They stand out in the corridor ready armed, and await the ringing of my bell to rush in upon you.'

"'How many are there?'

"'Five.'

"'And when I am killed?'

"'Your splendid diamonds shall be mine.'

"I rang the bell violently.

"Immediately five ruffians, armed with swords, burst into the room.

"But I held in my hand a pistol, the magic property of whose load, when exploded, rendered motionless in their several attitudes all those who came within reach of its charge. I fired on the intruders who were all five instantly brought to a deadlock transmuted, as it were, into stone.

"I turned toward Mme. d'Esnermeuil, who was still in a trance, and asked whether these men were all her accomplices.

"She nodded in the affirmative.

"'Then,' said I, 'they shall witness your punishment.'

"At once collecting my mental and physical energies I put the fair widow into so deep a state of trance that her powers of clairvoyance were increased a hundredfold. I mesmerized her until her teeth clattered, and ask her where she was.

"She sighed deeply, and muttered:

"'In a region of thick ice and intense cold!' And she wrung her hands and gnashed her teeth.

"I continued mesmerizing her until the tips of her fingers quivered and curled backward.

"'Now what do you see?' I asked.

"A stifled groan escaped her lips:

"'Fire!' she wailed, 'a place where there is nothing but fire! Oh, have mercy!'

"'Not yet,' I said, 'descend still lower and tell me what you see.'

"I gave her a few more magnetic passes.

"Soon she foamed at her moth and her eyes started out of their sockets.

"'Now,' said I, 'where are you?'

"'Oh, horror of horrors!' she shrieked, while her whole frame shook and writhed in the most appalling manner; 'I am in hell, and surrounded by all the spirits of the damned!'

"Of course, while this scene lasted her accomplices, although unable to move, were fully alive to the significance of the awful experience their mistress had undergone, but they could render her no assistance. With a few more waves of my hands I might have sent her soul down forever into that abode of wretchedness and despair on whose brink she now raved, but I reversed the mesmeric fluid and by slow degress brought her back to her first trance.

"Like pillars of salt the nice little party stood rooted there, with Mme. d'Esnermeuil, like the late Mrs. Lot, by their side. I cast a last look at the group, wrapped myself in a dense cloud of incense, and flew away.

"The police, when they came on the spot, found Mme. d'Esnermeuil the next morning surrounded by her braves, still planted where I had left them. They were with difficulty restored to a proper sense of their situation.

"Cardinal Mazarin, whose acquaintance I had made through Maria Mancini, gave our gay city of Paris the amusing spectacle of seeing the handsome widow hanged by her fair neck, and her whole gang of accomplices broken on the wheel in the Place de Greve, then the usual place for executions of this sort. Anne of Austria, the queen mother, and the entire court were present on this occasion and enjoyed the sight exceedingly.

"I take a single drop of my rejuvenating panacea on every change of the moon, and it agrees well with me, as I am now 2,586 years old."

Why He Was Acquitted.

All the world loves a hero. Let a man defend his country in any hour of need and he may be sure of enthusiastic indulgence when he is perhaps most in want of it. Mr. H. B. Stanton tells, in his "Random Recollections," the following incidents, which occurred in one of our courts:

A Revolutionary soldier had been indicted for passing counterfeit money. Charles M. Lee defended the silver-haired veteran on his trial. The evidence against him was clear, and there was not a shadow of doubt of his guilt. Still, he was a man who had followed Gen. "Mad Anthony" Wayne up the creggy steps of Stony Point on the dark night of July 15, 1779, when that fortress was carried by storm.

Lee summed up the case with rare vehemence, graphically described the bloody attack on Stony Point, and, with tears dripping down his cheeks, implored the jury to acquit the old soldier. It was not then known that the foreman of the jury had been with the defendant on the perilous night. The jury were out an hour. When it returned the clerk asked: "Gentlemen of the jury have you agreed upon a verdict?"

"We have."

"Do you find the prisoner at the bar guilty or not guilty?"

"Not guilty, because he helped to storm Stony Point!" shouted the foreman.

Peculiarities of the Insane.

Keeper Maest of the Erie county (N. Y.) almshouse says that in his experience one of the peculiar freaks of insanity is the seeming reversal of natural tendencies. "For instance," he says, "we have in the male wards fine collections of potted plants and climbing vines which grow so luxuriantly that they curtain the windows. The men tend these carefully, pluck away the dead leaves, stir up the dirt in the pots, prune the vines, keep them carefully watered, and in divers other ways manifest the tenderest waatchfulness. Not so with the women. Every attempt to introduce plants and vines as a feature of the female wards, save in the cottage where the mildest cases are confined, has proved a flat failure. The women pull out the plants by the roots, tear down the vines, and manifest other destructive tendencies entirely at variance with the nature of the sex in general."

A Miraculous Painting.

A copy of the painting known as the "Sacred Image of the Mother of Good Counsel," in the town of Genazzano, Italy, was unveiled at mass in the Church of Our Lady of Good Counsel, in Madison street, near Ralph avenue, Brooklyn, recently. The painting originally appeared in a church at Scutari, Albania, and was thence transferred to Genazzano on April 23, 1467. It was suspended in mid air, was visited by many pilgrims, and many miracles are said to have been performed there. It represents the Virgin and Infant. The face of the Virgin flushes when she is particularly pleased. This copy is said to have touched the original. It is placed on the altar of the Blessed Virgin. Popes Pius and Leo are said to have derived inspiration from it.

HIGH BALLOONING FOR SCIENCE

How It Feels to Be Seven Miles Above the Earth.

Mons. W. de Fonvielle, an experienced French æronaut, claims that balloons can be made very serviceable to astronomical science, and, indeed, he was the first to advocate their use for observations. He believes that under skillful management observers can be safely carried above any obscuring veil of clouds, but sufficient time must be given to the necessary preparations and the balloon must be capable of carrying a large amount of ballast. It seems to be certain that photographs taken so far above the lower strata of the atmosphere would have a much better chance of success than those taken on the surface of the earth. The total eclipse of the moon, which will take place in January next, will afford an opportunity, of which many will doubtless take an advantage, of testing the value of balloon observation.

An attempt has lately been made at Paris by MM. Jovis and Mallett to rise to a greater height in the atmosphere by means of a balloon than has ever yet been done. The æronauts took with them a number of instruments for the purpose of making observations, and among these was a barometer designed to measure heights of upwards of 30,000 feet, and a thermometer which would record temperatures 50° below zero. A new feature was represented by the provision of bags of oxygen, for the purpose of inhalation by the æronauts after attaining high elevations. It will be remembered that in 1862 Messrs. Glaisher and Coxwell ascended from Wolverhampton for the purpose of making scientific observations from a balloon, and that they reached the extraordinary altitude of seven miles above the earth. On this occasion both the occupants of the car suffered very much, Mr. Glaisher becoming quite insensible for a time. A similar experience seems to have been the lot of these French experimenters, one of them having fainted twice upon reaching the altitude of some 20,000 feet, the faintness being speedily mitigated after the inhalation of the oxygen provided. The ascent was successful, but the hight reached was far below that attained by Mr. Glaisher and his companionion as already recorded.

CURED BY FAITH ALONE.

A Danbury Doctor's Ruse to Make a Dumb Woman Resume Talking.

A reliable physician in Danbury relates a remarkable case of curing a woman who had been unable to utter a syllable in two years. She had been treated by a number of doctors for loss of voice, but to no purpose. The physician satisfied himself that there was no disease in the organ of speech nor any derangement. He concluded that she could speak if only she would be influenced to exert the will power. From a conversation with her carried on in writing he discovered that she had great faith in miraculous cures and thought she could only be relieved in some such way. He found, too, that she was superstitious.

He concluded to try the effect of a little mummery on her. Accordingly, one morning when visiting her he sat down by a table and leaned his head upon his hands for some five minutes without speaking, as if wrapt in meditation. He suddenly jumped up and told the woman that he was now right, that he was going to cure her on a certain day. He then gave her minute directions in respect to it. He told her that on that day he should come to the house at 10 a. m.; that he should at first give three raps on the window, and then he should go to the front door and give two raps; that when the door opened he would be found standing with both hands upon the door post and leaning his head upon them; that the door to her room must be opened wide, and that he would walk in with measured tread, and when he got to her bed-room he should say: "Good morning," and that she would answer in reply: "Good morning, Doctor." On the appointed day he did just as he said he should, and when he said "good morning" to her she promptly made the reply: "Good morning, Doctor," in a loud, strong voice. She seemed utterly astonished herself, but said she felt that what the doctor had said would be true and firmly believed that he had wrought a miracle in her cure.

Off With the Old, On With the New.

It is sad to learn that one of the sacrifices which progress requires from Japan is the abolition of the pretty, graceful, and becoming costumes with which the women clothe themselves. A correspondent at Tokio declares that the adoption of the European garb is not due to feminine caprice or the eagerness of milliners after some new thing. It is a part of a deliberate policy entered upon by Count Ito, the most sagacious of living Japanese statesmen, and is closely connected with the future well-being of the country. Japan has committed herself to Occidentalism, and she must go on and become one of the circle of Western nations in all respects. But though the male Japanese shoots and hunts, and speaks French, and reads Mr. Herbert Spencer, and does a little on the stock exchange, the Japanese woman is still in the Oriental condition of bondage and ignorance. Japanese domestic life, thinks Count Ito, must be revolutionized, and the present arrangements of the Japanese home rendered physically impossible. Corsets, and "dress improvers," and Parisian bonnets will tend to that end. Perhaps so; but it is a pity that a dress which combines simplicity and grace with the most delightful picturesqueness should have to disappear.

Reform in Japan.

The Japanese try hard to reform the institutions of their country according to European models. Their latest step in that direction is the study of the local or self-government of the districts of Prussia. Komatsuhara was attached to the Japanese legation at Berlin for three years. His first study was the German language, which he mastered after a comparatively short time. Then he studied the Prussian administration under the guidance of an assistant in the ministry of the interior, Mr. Herfurth, traveling through the eastern and the Rhenish provinces of the kingdom. He has now gone home again and he will be occupied in adapting the Prussian system to the local circumstances of Japan.

Cookery in German Schools.

At Darmstadt, Germany, there is a charity school for girls which has passed its sixtieth anniversary. The management being progressive, tuition in cooking was introduced this fall. Fifteen of the older girls are to devote one day a week to cooking, five of them being cooks and ten assistants. As a practical test of their success the girls have to make their dinner on their own product. The teachers aim at a practical knowledge of the cheapest, the most wholesome and the most appetizing dishes accessible to people of limited means. The so-called quantity prepared by each cook is calculated for an average family of five persons.

IGNORANT HORDES OF CHINA.

[illegible] Regulator of Tien-Tsin Gives a Dismal Account of That Country.

"After residing for some time in a city where 80,000 Chinese are congregated," said Mr. Bromley, Consul at Tien-Tsin, "you can rest assured I know what I am talking about when I say they are ready to pour into this country in torrents, and are only watching their opportunity to do so. In Singapore, Bombay, Manilla, and various other points, they are crowding everybody out; and even Japan will, I think, soon pass a restriction act to keep them from overrunning their country. They can never become civilized, in our sense of the word, for what is known as the literate or learned men of the country will not allow any innovation on their old-time customs, and are opposed to all progress.

"Such men as Viceroy Li Hong Chang and Marquis Tseng, who see the necessity of advancing with the present age, are powerless to effect any radical reforms, and their every effort, such as building railroads or introducing foreign inventions, is hampered by these same numbskulls. Another point that retards progress is the fact that the officers in power require a 10 per cent 'divy' in advance before they will allow any improvements or special enterprise to be inaugurated, and it must be paid, too, or else it cannot be worked.

"The lower class, which forms the bulk of the population, lives from hand to mouth, averaging say 10 cents per day. The filth and squalor of Tien-Tsin are awful. Begging and robbery are reduced to a science. The beggars have regular clans and work the place on systematic principles. As for the robbers, they are a power in the land, and before a silver train starts these gentry have to be "fixed" so that the treasure will get through to its destination in safety. The tin-tai (government officials), magistrates, and mandarins form the wealthy class. They are frequently very rich and try to be extremely exclusive.

"I often meet Li Hong Chang, the viceroy, and I found him to be a very shrewd kind of a fellow. In Chinese politics he stands pre eminent, and is the power behind the throne. He is very rich. Every time he makes a visit to Pekin it costs him between $60,000 and $70,000. Part of this is for so called toll at the gates of the ancient city. He professes to be greatly attached to America and American institutions.

"There are still millions of acres of land not taken up in China, and there is yet room for four times the present population; but once let them know in general—very few know at present—of our country and the chance for making money here, and they would pour in by the millions, by fair or foul means. I claim that our restriction act cannot be too forcibly carried out."

SCARLET FEVER.

The London "Lancet's" Suggestions as to Its Treatment.

It would be interesting if a census were to be taken with a view to ascertain what treatment of scarlet fever was most in vogue among practitioners to-day. We suspect that not an inconsiderable portion of this vote would fall to the lot of expectancy, by which must be understood the absence of any attempt to arrest the course of the malady, combined with great watchfulness of the symptoms and the treatment of the most dangerous of these morbid phenomena. The present epidemic is for the most part of a mild nature, but considerable attention has to be given to the throat, which seems to suffer in a marked degree, the glandular swelling being correspondingly marked. Hence it will be found that gargles of all kinds, and especially those of an antiseptic nature, are freely used, together with compresses of various degrees of heat and moisture applied to the neck. Most practitioners, even those of the most expectant schools, employ topical applications to the throat and nose. Many articles are used to relieve the thirst and sensation of dryness, but nothing is more effective than ice and a little raspberry vinegar. It is important to keep the nostrils and nasal passages sweet and clean. For cerebral symptoms, nothing is better than the application of cold, either in the mild form of lint soaked in ice water and applied to the shaven head, or in the more effective capilline tubes, with irrigation. Compression of the carotid arteries and bleeding are seldom practiced nowadays, either in scarlet or any other fever. Aconite in minute doses, frequently repeated, is still the favorite drug of many practitioners, but its employment needs the exercise of clinical discretion, especially in children. Actual bathing in cool or tepid water is practiced by but few physicians, though the number of physicians who recommend the use of cold or tepid sponging, the patient lying in bed on a mackintosh, appears to be largely on the increase. Most of the alleged specific and curative agents have long since lapsed into discredit. Belladonna finds but few adherents and carbonate of ammonia almost none. Considerable difference of opinion exists on the merits of inunction with fat, cold cream, and the like, two of the most recent authors on the diseases of children taking opposite views, Dr. Goodhart advocating and Dr. Angel Money opposing the universal inunction, though the latter sees no objection to relieving the tension of the palms and soles by the application of geoline or vaseline scented with eucalyptol.

Poisoned by Cigarettes.

Walter Pierce, a young man of 17, whose home is at Gloversville, N. Y., had a close call recently. He is addicted to cigarettes, and took advantage of his visit to Albany to enjoy himself to his fullest capacity, smoking several packages a day. Of late he has complained at times of feeling drowsy, and thought the cigarettes did not agree with him. The sequel shows that they did not. One day after breakfast he smoked about fifteen, and then went into the parlor of his aunt's house to lie down. When called for dinner he was found in an unconscious state, with his body perfectly rigid. The frightened family called in Dr. Schill, who recognized the symptoms, and after working over the victim for several hours got him in a partially normal condition. The doctor says the young man will recover, and the young man says he is done with cigarettes.

A Burglar Bold.

A Portland (Oregon) burglar, while raiding a house on Congress street, awakened a young woman in one of the rooms. The gallant Jimmy put his hand over her mouth, kissed her affectionately, and said: "Keep still, sis; I won't hurt you. All I want is these trinkets." She managed to arouse the house, when with a polite "Good-night, sis," he sprang from a window, having every portable article of value in the room and a sum of money. He left his hat behind, and it was hung on the rack in the front hall to give the police a clew, and the family then retired. Then the burglar returned and stole the hat.

BARBAROUS RUSSIAN SOLDIERS

How Gen. Skobeleff Won the Admiration of His Men.

He is, under ordinary circumstances, a soft-hearted, good-natured fellow, but there are savage instincts in his semi-barbarous nature which render him capable of almost any brutality, if he is once thoroughly excited, says a writer on the Russian soldier. The awful atrocities committed during the late persecutions of the Jews are still fresh in our minds, and bear witness to the savagery of the Russian peasant, and the treatment experienced by the Turcomans, both after the capture of Khiva and the fall of Geok Tepe, show that, at all events in Asia, the authorities even encourage the worst passions of the soldier. Perhaps Skobeleff's greatest quality as a successful general was his thorough appreciation of the peculiarities of the men he commanded. He had a wonderful hold on their sympathies, and he enjoyed a popularity with the rank and file such as no other Russian general has ever acquired. It was Skobeleff who conducted the pursuit and harrying of the wretched Yomud Turcomans after Khiva, so vividly described by his friend and admirer, the American correspondent MacGahan; and it was Skobeleff who, after the storming of Geok Tepe and the rout of its brave Tekke defenders, gave twenty-four hours' complete liberty to his excited soldiers to work their wicked will on persons and property of the defenseless families of the dispersed Turcomans. Skobeleff thoroughly understood his men, and re-established his control as deliberately as he permitted unbridled license. For exactly twenty-four hours the captors of Geok Tepe were uncontrolled; within six hours of the temination of that period two soldiers were shot for trifling crimes. This circumstance, coupled with the fact of Skobeleff's great popularity in the army, gives a striking indication of the character of the Russian soldier, as judged by the man who knew him best.

A TRUE TALE.

President Lincoln's Story of the End of Sykes' Dog.

When Mr. Lincoln heard of the scattering of the Confederates under Hood and Gen. Thomas he was reminded of the following story: "Out in lower Illinois, in a little village, there was a butcher named Sykes, who had a large, wicked mischievous bull-dog, which was regarded as a town nuisance. Fowl were killed, clothes were pulled from the lines, meat-houses were robbed, children were scared, and 'Sykes' dog' was blamed for all and blamed justly. Now, there was a man named Henderson who had a fine turkey killed by this dog of Sykes, and he swore revenge. So he took about a quarter of a pound of powder and did it up in a piece of buckskin, tying up a piece of punk so that it projected out of the little bundle of powder. Then he put the bundle in a large piece of corn bread and had it in readiness. It was not long before Sykes' dog came trotting along, and Henderson, lighting the punk with a cigar threw the bit of bread to the cur, who gobbled it at a mouthful. The next minute there was an explosion. The dog's head was blown over a fence into the creek, his hind legs and tail were sent up and lodged on Henderton's poarch, his fore legs were thrown across the street, and the rest of the bow-wow was laid about in small pieces. 'Whorra!' exclaimed a looker-on, 'you've rather used up Sykes' dog, hain't ye, Henderson?' 'Yes,' replied Henderson, 'I rather think that as a dog Sykes won't find him of much use.' And so of the Rebel army," added Mr. Lincoln, with one of his sad smiles, "as an army Hood won't find it of much use."

Keeping the Calendar.

No doubt most people remember the number of days in any particular month by recalling the rhymes which they learned at school. Another method is practiced in Iceland, and it is so simple and ingenious as to be worth knowing. Mr. Metcalfe gives it in his book, "The Oxonian in Iceland."

Shut the fist, and let the knuckle of the fore finger represent January with its thirty-one days, and the depression between that and the next knuckle will represent February with its less number of days. And thus every month that corresponds to a knuckle will be found to contain thirty-one days, and every month that corresponds to a depression a less number of days.

The little finger will represent July, and beginning again with the fore finger knuckle, it stands for August, and from this one goes on counting through the months of the year.

Played a Trick on His Patient.

A celebrated French physician, Ricord, was one day walking along the boulevard in Paris, when he met an old gentleman who was very rich, but who was at the same time noted for his extreme stinginess. The old man, who was somewhat of a hypochondriac, imagined that he could get some medical advice from Ricord without paying for it.

"Doctor, I am feeling very poorly."

"Where do you suffer most?"

"In my stomach, doctor."

"Ah, that's bad. Please shut your eyes. That's right. Now put out your tongue, so I can examine it closely."

The invalid did as he was told. After he had waited patiently for about ten minutes, he opened his eyes and found himself surrounded by a crowd, who supposed he was crazy. Dr. Ricord, in the meantime, had disappeared.

New Use for Apples.

A new use for apples has been discovered. A prominent apple grower of Rensselaer county has for several years been running a large evaporator on what are known as "cider apples." These machines slice the apples, skin, core, and all, very thin. These thin slices are then bleached white by the use of sulphur fumes. When thoroughly dry the apples are put into sugar barrels and packed as tight as they can be pressed, so that a single barrel will hold 200 pounds, or twenty bushels of apples. These are then shipped to Germany, where they are ground up for the manufacture of what is known as cider, and it is generally understood that much of it enters into the composition of champagne, Rhine, and other wines.

Bad for the Robber.

An English paper tells a wild tale about an old German who has invented a safe that on its lock being tampered with throws open its doors, seizes and drags and locks in the burglar and handcuffs and holds him in readiness to be conducted to the police court in the morning.

Onions in Egypt.

Egypt is again becoming a land of onion culture. Large quantities are yearly shipped to Europe from Alexandria and other ports. A few years ago the trade hardly existed, while in two months of last year alone 14,000 tons were shipped to Liverpool.

THE PERSONAL DEVIL.

Burdette Discourses on a Theological Subject.

Do I believe in a personal devil, son?

Don't I? I don't know of any creature in the universe more given to personality than this same devil to whom you allude.

I believe in demoniacal possessions. I myself have seen men possessed with devils exceedingly fierce. I have seen a child which had a dumb spirit. Why I myself have been grievously vexed with a devil. Not once, my son, but many times; not only twenty-five years ago, but yesterday, possibly to-day; more than likely to-morrow.

Why, my boy, did you never get up in the morning with a demon of ill humor, of perversity of hatefulness, in full possession of you? You feel strong, vigorous, well; your head doesn't ache; your vision is clear, your debts are paid; the day is bright, sunny, beautiful; nobody gives you a cross word; everybody in the dining-room speaks pleasantly to you as you come in, and the bitter, mean, waspish devil of perversity that has possession of you snarls out a hateful answer the minute you open your lips to speak; makes you say something you never intended to say; puts into your mouth words that make your own heart ache, as your eyes see the lips that you love quiver with pain at your harshness.

Have you never maintained a surly, mean, cruel humor while a brave, loving face, looking up into your clouded brow, was cheerily trying to cast out the evil spirit? Have you never done some mean thing at which your better nature revolted? Never been ill tempered all day when you had no cause, no reason for it and were torturing yourself even as you tortured those whom you most dearly loved?

Ah, yes; you have writhed in the clutches of these devils of perversity, obstinacy, ill humor, unreasoning and unreasonable meanness, fiercely crying out against the love that would cast out the evil spirits.

But this, you say, is owing to physical and mental causes. The body is in ill health, and there is in the human organization an integration and co-ordination of vital action, which—there; that will do; I always feel one coming into me when I hear you talk in that way. Physical health has nothing to do with it, because some of the greatest sufferers the world has ever known have been entirely free from this demoniac possession, while some of the meanest men I ever knew have lived in perfect health to their eightieth year. You know yourself that when you feel that way you are possessed of a devil.

Do I believe in him? My boy, it doesn't make a particle of difference whether a man with the jumping toothache believes in the toothache or not; he's got it; the toothache is in possession just the same. And, between you and me and the man named Legion, he acts for all the world as though he did believe in it.

A QUEER CHURN.

An Odd Experiment Tried in Butter-Making.

A young lady told me of a scientific experiment she has been trying. Her boarding house is a very fashionable and exclusive and excellent one, but of late the perversities of the butter have been very trying. Butter sometimes has a way of being perverse, and this usually in August, when it should be the best, just as children are likely to appear at their very worst when they should behave the best. Now, some one told this young lady that if cream were buried in the earth for twenty-four hours it would then be found to have become butter of a superior quality and flavor. She longed to test the truth of this statement, and, confessing her ambition to Mrs. Daniel Merriman, she was made a present of a bag of cream from the Bigelow farm. She told me, with the minuteness indispensable to the description of scientific procedures, that the bag was of white cloth, of strong and firm material, and that the cream, of course, being from the Bigelow farm, was of lovely richness, of the sort usually described as being "thick enough to cut with a knife." She made the excavation in the ground, of the necessary size, and deposited her cream and covered it up. After twenty-four hours she unearthed it and it was a ball of golden, hard, delicious butter, wanting only salt to make it perfect, and this she added with her own fair hands. There were no traces of butter-milk; it had all been absorbed through the pores of the cloth into the earth. It is improbable that the young lady will go on making butter after this manner, but her method may indicate that there is shortly to be a revolution in the art of butter-making. The new way has to recommend it a great saving of labor, and, one would say, of care as well. In these wonderful days it is impossible to prophesy what great and momentous results may come from such a happening as this.

Cold of the Polar Regions.

It is impossidle to form any idea of a tempest in the Polar seas. The icebergs are like floating rocks whirled along a rapid current. The huge crystal mountains dash against each other, backward and forward, bursting with a roar of thunder, and returning to the charge until, losing their equilibrium, they tumble over in a cloud of spray, upheaving the ice-fields, which fall afterward like the crack of a whip lash on the boiling sea. The sea-gulls fly away screaming, and often a black shining whale comes for an instant to the surface. When the midnight sun grazes the horizon, the floating mountains and rocks seem immersed in a wave of beautiful light. The cold is by no means so insupportable as might be supposed. We passed from a heated cabin at 30 degrees above zero to 47 degrees below zero in the open air without convenience. A much higher degree of cold, however, becomes insufferable if there is no wind. At 15 degrees below zero a steam, as if from a boiling kettle, rises from the water. At once, frozen by the wind, it falls into a fine powder. This phenomenon is called sea-smoke. At 40 degrees the snow and human bodies also smoke, which smoke at once changes into millions of tiny particles, like needles of ice, which fill the air and make a light continuous noise like the rustle of a stiff silk. At this temperature the trunks of trees burst with a loud report, the rocks break up, and the earth opens and vomits smoking water. Knives break in cutting butter. Cigars go out by contact with the ice on the beard. To talk is fatiguing. At night the eyelids are covered with a crust of ice, which must be carefully removed before one can open them.

Forewarned is Forearmed.

"Jimmy, you'd better stop slidin' down that cellar door," said one urchin to another.

"What for?"

"Cos you're wearin' out the seat o' yer pants."

"I don't care."

"Well, you better. School's goin' to commence purty soon."

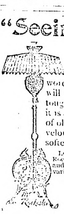
"Seeing is Believing."



And a good lamp must be simple; when it is not simple it is not good. Simple, Beautiful, Good—these words mean much, but to see "The Rochester" will impress the truth more forcibly. All metal, tough and seamless, and made in three pieces only, it is absolutely safe and unbreakable. Like Aladdin's of old, it is indeed a "wonderful lamp," for its marvelous light is purer and brighter than gas light, softer than electric light and more cheerful than either.

Look for this stamp—THE ROCHESTER. If the lamp dealer hasn't the genuine Rochester, and the style you want, send to us for our new illustrated catalogue, and we will send you a lamp safely by express—your choice of over 2,000 varieties from the Largest Lamp Store in the World.

Caution!—There have recently been issued several cheap reprints of the 1847 edition of Webster's Unabridged Dictionary, an edition long since superannuated. These books are given various names,—"Webster's Unabridged," "The Great Webster's Dictionary," "Webster's Big Dictionary," "Webster's Encyclopedic Dictionary," etc., etc.

Many announcements concerning them are very misleading, as the body of each, from A to Z, is 44 years old, and printed from cheap plates made by photographing the old pages.

Improved Passnger Service.

Under the new time schedule of "the North-Western Line," C., St. P., M. & O. Ry., all passenger trains of this lin make the trip between St. Paul and Chicago in less than 14 hours.

The Pullman and Wagner Vestibuled Limited, leaving St. Paul at 7:30 p. m. makes the trip to Chicago in 13½ hours and from Chicago to St. Paul in 13 hours and 25 minutes.

The Daylight Express leaving St Paul at 7;45 a. m. makes the trip to Chicago in 13 hours and 50 minutes and from Chicago to St. Paul in 13 hours and 45 minutes.

This is the only line running all its trains in less than 14 hour between St. Paul and Chicago, and while this time is quick trains don't have to run at as high speed to make their time as on other lines, because this is shorter than any other line.

In addition to these facts this is the only line by which connections are assure in Chicago with all fast line trains from Chicag to the East and South in the morning and at night.

Note.—Fares by this line are always as low as by any other.

Consumption Cured.

An old physician, retired from practice having had placed in his hands by an East India missionary the formula of a simple vegetable remedy for the speedy and permanent cure of Consumption, Bronchitis, Catarrh, Asthma and all throat and Lung Affections, also a positive and radical cure for Nervous Debility and all Nervous Complaints, after having tested its wonderful curative powers in thousands of cases, has felt it his duty to make it known to his suffering fellows. Actuated by this motive and desire to relieve human suffering I will send, free of charge, to all who desire it, this recipe in German, French or English, with full directions for preparing and using. Sent by mail, by addressing with stamp, naming this paper. W. A. NOYES 820 Powers' Block, Rochester, N. Y.

State of Minnesota, county of Polk—ss.
In probate court, special term, Sept. 28th, 1891.

In the matter of the estate of Amanda C. Watson, deceased.

Letters testamentary on the estate of said deceased being this day granted unto John Watson of said county, it is ordered that all claims and demands of all persons against said estate be presented to this court, for examination and allowance, at the probase office in the city of Crookston on the first Monday in March, 1892, at 10 o'clock in the forenoon.

It is further ordered, that six months from the date hereof be allowed to creditors to present their claims against said estate, at the expiration of which time all claims not presented to said court or not proven to its satisfaction, shall be forever barred, unless for cause shown further time be allowed.

Ordered further, that notice of the time and place of the hearing and examination of said claims and demands shall be given by publishing this order once in each week for three successive weeks prior to the day appointed for such examination, in the Red Lake Falls News, a weekly newspaper printed and published at Red Lake Falls, in said county.

Dated at Crookston the 28th day of Sept. D. 1891. By the Court, C. M. BENSON,
Judge of Probate.

Mortgage Foreclosure Sale.

Default having been made in the payment of the money secured by a certain mortgage, duly executed and delivered by Silvester Johnson and Julia Johnson, his wife, of Polk county, Minnesota, mortgagors, to Francis W. Noyes, mortgagee, bearing date the 7th day of July 1882, and, with a power of sale therein contained duly recorded in the office of the register of deeds in and for the county of Polk and state of Minnesota, on the 8th day of July, 1882, at 11:10 o'clock a. m. in book F of mortgages on pages 562 to 565 and no action or proceeding having been instituted, at law or otherwise, to recover the debt secured by said mortgage, or any part thereof. The amount claimed to be due upon said mortgage at the date hereof is the sum of four hundred and ninety seven dollars ([illegible]) besides the sum of one hundred [illegible] and [illegible] dollars for taxes necessarily paid by said mortgagee and interest, and twenty five dollars, attorney's fees, stipulated for in said mortgage.

Now, therefore, notice is hereby given, that the said mortgage will be foreclosed by a sale of the premises described in said mortgage, viz:

The east half of the southeast quarter and the east half of the north east quarter of section number thirty two in township No. one hundred and forty nine north of range forty-five west, and containing one hundred and sixty acres of land more or less, according to the government survey thereof in Polk county, and state of Minnesota, which sale will be made by the sheriff of said Polk county, or his deputy, at the front door of the court house, in the city of Crookston in said county and state, on the [illegible] day of November, 1891, at [illegible] o'clock [illegible] m., of that day.

Dated October 1st, A. D. 1891.
Francis W. Noyes, Mortgagee.

St. Vitus Dance Cured! VIII.

SAN ANDREAS, Cal., February, 1890.

My boy, 13 years old, was so affected by St. Vitus Dance that he could not go to school for two years. Two bottles of Pastor Koenig's Nerve Tonic restored his health, and he is now attending school again.

Recommends It to Many.

SEYMOUR, Ind., Oct. 1, 1890.

My daughter became epileptic about five years ago through a fright. All physicians' treatment availed nothing, until I used Pastor Koenig's Nerve Tonic, which at once dispelled the attacks. It is the best remedy I ever used, and I have recommended it to many of such as are suffering from this dread disease.

Did he Kill "Bob Wood?"

From the East Grand Forks News.

The detective agency and police have captured a light-haired, ruddy-faced and thick-set man who is a Scandinavian but sails under theSaxon name of Schultz—at Crookston and he awaits identification and due process of law. While ostensibly the chase for the murderer of Robert Wood was abandoned—all our officers were vigilant and they traced every thread and movement of strangers, donothings and suspicious characters until they closed in on the man above described as the most likely canidate for trial. The suspect came to the boarding house of Mrs. Fred Shultz on S. Third street during the week preceding the murder and, during the crowd on Friday night slept with Jake Andrews. He had no baggage but among his scanty effects was a little toy baby chair and some wire. He represanted to Mrs. Shultz that he was a chair maker—though he did not seem to be employed much at tha trade while here. Neither did his hands look like those of one who toils for his daily bread. Around his waist he wore a broad leathern girdle. He was quite talkative and spent much of his time on the east side of the river. After the murder of RobertWoods he seems to have known more about how it happened than any one and contradicted the boarders. As for money he had plenty of bills and silver. On Sunday evening when he paid his bill he had a pocketbook which Mrs. Shultz thinks she now recognizes in the one captured on the person of the suspect. Gold was also seen and the watch of Robert Woods, it is said was traced from Jameston to a point in Iowa where it was sent. He arrived at the Shultz house on Wednesday evening before the murder and stayed there until Monday, following. On Saturday night he went to bed about ten o'clok but the window opens out on a low roof from which he could easily have descended, later in order to avoid suspicion, if bent on depredations. There are other facts in possession of the officers which will duly come out at the hearing.

Had the Desired Effect. II

CARROLLTON, Green Co., Ill., Nov., '88.

I highly recommend Pastor Koenig's Nerve Tonic to anybody that has suffered from headache as my son did for 5 years, because 2 bottles of the medicine cured him. M. McTIGUE.

LARRABEE, Wis., October, 1890.

Through a fright my son became affected with spasms and nervous prostration. We used one bottle of Pastor Koenig's Nerve Tonic, and he has not had a spasm since. ED KITZEROW.

IDA GROVE, Iowa, Oct 9, 1890.

My wife suffered from headache for ten years and, despite all treatment from doctors, she got no relief. After using only one bottle of Pastor Koenig's Nerve Tonic, she is entirely cured.

The Board of Managers of Minnesota's world's fair exhibits have made an appeal to the people of Minnesota for action in the matter of raising funds. The board became acquainted with the plans and purposes of those who were promoters of this vast undertaking; examined the grounds where the exposition is to be held; accepted the sight which had been designated for Minnesota; learned what other states purposed; what agencies were employed to bring this exposition before the peoples of the earth; and from the facts so gathered, we were convinced that Minnesota, with fifty thousand dollars, could hardly afford to enter the lists; that this sum was altogether inadequate to make the "complete and creditable display" which is called for by the act which appropriated it. The plan proposed to raise an additional $100,000 leaves to the citizsns of each county the adoption of such means as they see fit for raising their county's quota. The following methods have been suggested: 1st, making of notes drawn by responsible residents of each county, upon which money may be had upon call. 2nd, through personal solicitation for out and out donations. 3d, the holding of popular concerts, lectures, etc. Surely this enterprise makes its appeal to our gratitude. to national and state pride and to enlightened self interest. The quota or amount of each county in the state on the assessed valuation of the real and personal property therein and as rendered in 1890, is adjusted, the rate of assessment for this purpose, in order to produce $100,000, being abont seventeen hundredths of one mill on the dollar. Polk county's obligation is $1,100.

A Very Narrow Escape.

Yes, I had a very narrow escape, said a prominent citizen to a friend. I was confined to my bed for more than two years and all my friends gave me up. I had running sores on my limbs and after using nearly everything was induced to try Metzger's Pain Eradicator and now here I am, sound and hearty. You will find it for sale by W. A. Schreiter. Price 50c a bottle, trial size free.

A Remarkable Good Man.

He who attends to the comfort of his family and will not suffer himself or allow them to, with that most dreadful of pains, rheumatism. Metzger's Angle and Wormwood oil Liniment is a positive cure for rheumatism and sprains. It is the best external application on earth. One bottle is better than any amount of porous plaster. Price 50 cents per bottle. For sale by W. A. Schreiter.

Pronounced Hopeless, Yet Saved.

From a letter written by Mrs. Ada E. Hurd, of Groton, S. D., we quote: "Was taken with a cold, which settled on my Lungs, cough set in and finaly terminated in Consumption. Four docters gave me up, faying I could live but a short time. I gave myself up to my Saviour, determined if I could not stay with my friends on earth, I would meet my absent ones above. My husband was advised to get Dr. King's New Discovery for consumption, Cough and colds. I gave it a trial, took in all eight bottles; it has cured me, and thank God I am now a well and hearty woman." Trial bottles free W. A. Schreiter's Drugstore, regular size, 50c. and $ 1.00.

His Curiosity Was Gratified.

A stranger stood alone in the street of a great city. His hat was napless his boots covered with the dust of travel. Around him on every side a hurrying throng pushed and jostled in mad haste. He turned to a friendly policeman and said: "Say: Where be all these people gwine"! The officer was dumfounded at such ignorance Where are they going? Why, to purchase tickets via the popular Wisconsin Central If you are going anywhere you want to go with the crowd and ride on the best track in the most comfortable cars and with the greatest ease you ever experienced" For tickets berths and further information apply to any ticket agent.

At the annual meeting of the New York, Pennsylvania and Ohio Railroad at Cleveland, Ohio, the old board of directors and the officers were re-elected. Gross earnings of the road were $7,100,000, or $158,000 less than last year.

The annual meeting of the Producers' Protective Association was held at Franklin, Pa., Friday. The object of the Association is to combine all the independent oil refiners in the country in opposition to the Standard Oil Company.

Negotiations have been completed by which the Shoshone and Arapahoe Indians cede to the government 1,100,000 acres of land in Wind River Reservation, Wyoming, for $600,000. The country is well watered and the soil is rich.

Gov. Steele two weeks ago tendered his resignation as governor of Oklahoma territory to the president. The governor Saturday received a letter from the president accepting the resignation. The cause of Gov. Steele's resignation is not known.

Shipments of fruit to the east from San Jose, Cal., during the last week are the heaviest on record, amounting to nearly 4,000,000 pounds. Over 1,000,000 pounds of this was green fruit and the remainder is divided between canned and dried fruit.

At Pittsfield, Mass., Tuesday, the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions began its eighty-second annual meeting. The total cost of missions for the year was $824,048, and the receipts $824,825. The field reports were encouraging.

James Dredge and Sir Henry Wood, of the Royal commission to represent Great Britain at the World's Fair, have prepared a report eulogizing the prospects and arrangements for the fair and urging active participation by the people of Great Britain.

Miss Maggie Smith, of Guthrie, O. T., discovered that Keokuk, chief of the Iowa Indians, was living on a piece of land not allotted to him. She at once filed on the land and the chief will be ejected. The claim is highly improved and is valued at $4,000.

The engagement has just been announced of Carl, the eldest son of Manufacturer Emil Weissbrod, and Miss Florence, the 18-year-old daughter of Mrs. Frank Leslie-Wilde, the New York publisher. Miss Leslie is said to be heir to something over $1,000,000.

It is announced that the daughters of the late Gen. Boulanger will contest four of the clauses of his will. It is expected that the legal proceedings will result in the development of some interesting evidence regarding the dead man's inner political and private affairs.

The directors of the American Tin Plate company of Elwood, Ind., held a meeting Saturday and let the contracts for the erection of a large tin-plate-works at that place. The buildings are to be of iron and fire-proof; contracts for boilers and machinery were also let.

The east-bound fast passenger-train on the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad was wrecked at Hicksville, Ohio, Wednesday at 2:35 o'clock. The train was running at full speed and the track spread, derailing four coaches. Fifty persons were injured and two men killed outright.

The statement of farm mortgages recorded and released in Kansas during September, shows that the excess of releases is over $2,000,000. There are only twenty counties in the state showing an excess of mortgages recorded and these are in the extreme western portion of the state.

E. F. Morearity, a member of the Omaha (Neb.) City Council, David Mahoney, Bob Ward, James Trainor, and William F. Bloom were arrested Wednesday on the charge of murder for complicity in the lynching of the negro Smith last Friday. Sixteen men are now under arrest for this crime.

Harrison Loring, the big Boston shipbuilder, has failed. The assignees say the liabilities will exceed $800,000. He had many government contracts and is at work at present on six vessels. He was a rival of the Cramps. The cause of the failure is inability to get money due him from the government.

A Rome dispatch says that an extreme sensation has been caused in that city by the declaration of the pope to the foreign powers that he does not feel secure in Rome. The substantial classes would view as a calamity the removal of the papacy, which is a most profitable patron for the trade and commerce of the city.

The petroleum record has again been broken, this time by the Mathews well in the new McDonald, Pa., field. It began a big spurt at 4 o'clock Sunday, and at the end of the first twenty-four hours had done nearly 17,000 barrels. It is still spouting at the rate of over 9,500 a day. The record exceeds anything ever before known in America.

IOWA ALLIANCE.

Some of the Planks That Form its Platform—Fusion Fails.

DES MOINES, Iowa, 23—The Iowa Farmers' Alliance adopted resolutions favoring a new system of taxation by which the farmer will be relieved; the the government ownership of railroads, telegraph and telephone and express companies; a 2-cent passenger rate bill; the free coinage of silver; the issuance of money direct to the people; the protection of the makers of promissory notes against the "innocent purchaser;" the reduction of contract interest to 6 per cent; the Australian ballot system and election of a United States senator by direct vote of the people, and a deep water outlet on the Gulf of Mexico. The pork packing combines of Chicago are denounced as well as gambling in options and futures on the Board of trade. A demand is made that the Conger lard bill be passed. The alien ownership of land is denounced. Another attempt was made to merge the Northern and Southern Alliances, but failed.

HORATIUS AT THE BRIDGE.

The Wisconsin Central Comes the Noble Roman Act at Ashland.

ASHLAND, Wis., Oct. 22—Attorney Gill, of the Wisconsin Central road, arrived in Ashland today for the purpose of stopping further work on the long bridge which is being built to connect Bay City and Ashland. It crosses the Wisconsin Central tracks, but before the injunction was served a compromise was effected between Mr. Gill and City Attorney Foster. Work has been suspended pending a plan of compromise to be presented by the Wisconsin Central to the city council this evening. There promises to be a long legal conflict, as the bridge completes Ashland's principal street, and the railroad is obstinately opposed to its construction.

Brazil Is Prosperous.

NEW YORK, Oct. 22.—The change 'd affaires of Brazil has received an official cablegram, dated Rio Janeiro, Oct. 13, declaring that all alarming rumors against Brazil are without foundation, and are the inventions of speculators in the exchange and the enemies of the republic. The President is nearly well. The economical condition of the country is more prosperous than ever before. The government expects to be able to show at the close of the present financial year a surplus exceeding $15,000,000.

It is stated that on one of the divisions, six Chicago & Northwestern conductors are looking for new situations. The Northwestern company has had female spotters at work on the freight trains, and the wholesale discharging is the result.

CAPITAL BREVITIES

Resume of Important Events at the National Capital.

What Is Being Done by the Executive and Other Departments.

GOOD WORDS FOR THE MAIZE INDUSTRY.

Secretary Rusk is in receipt of a communication from Col. C. J. Murphy, a special agent in Europe on behalf of the maize industry. Col. Murphy proceeded to Berlin by the secretary's instruction a short time ago in order to take advantage of the present shortage of the cereal crops of Europe by presenting to the attention of the German people and government the importance and value of American Indian corn as a cheap and nutritious substitute for other cereal foods. Col. Murphy writes most encouragingly. He has been able to produce bread, composed in part of rye and part of corn, which has been highly commended by all those to whom samples have been submitted as a most satisfactory substitute for the ordinary rye bread in general use among certain classes in Germany, and this at a cost based on the present price of rye flour and cornmeal in Germany less than the cost of bread made exclusively of rye flour and now retailed in that city.

ANOTHER GRANT MONUMENT.

Chicago's Grant monument was the first humiliation to New York and now Washington will add something in the same line. The Grand Army of the Republic intends to erect a suitable monument to Gen. Grant, in this city. The money necessary to pay such a tribute will be raised by popular subscription among the members of the Grand Army of the Republic. It is thought that not less than $50,000 will be required to erect the proper kind of monument.

The matter is somewhat in embryo yet, but a committee has been appointed to take the subject in hand. This committee is made up of a number of the most conspicuous men in the Grand Army of the Republic ranks, including Gen. Alger of Michigan and Gen. Burdett of Washington, the latter being chairman. As soon as the plans are decided upon the committee will enter into negotiations with a sculptor and the monument will be erected as speedily as possible. The monument will be one of the finest in the city.

SORGHUM SUGAR BY A NEW PROCESS.

Secretary Rusk's desk is loaded with mysterious looking tin-cans. He thinks those cans will prove of great value to the farmers. Pointing to one of them Uncle Jerry says to his visitors: "This is a sample of sorghum sugar manufactured by the new process, by which about 200 pounds of sugar is obtained from a ton of sorghum cane. If you taste it you will find that the peculiar flavor of the cane is absent."

"What is the new process?"

"It is called the alcoholic process. Alcohol is mixed with the sorghum sirup, and after treatment the former is recovered by redistillation, so that there is no appreciable loss. In the use of five barrels of alcohol only a quart or so was lost. The sugar, as you see, is nearly white, and it is strong in saccharine qualities, above 91°. I have received a dispatch from Mr. Swenson, who has been trying the alcoholic process, and he says that about twice as much crystallized sugar per ton of cane can be obtained as can be obtained by the process heretofore in use. If this estimate be correct the discovery will be one of inestimable value and benefit to the farmers of the United States who produce sorghum."

GERMAN CONCESSIONS.

Nobody in Washington knows who started the report that the German reciprocity convention had actually been concluded. It was given to New York newspapers and was published under a Washington date line. The report was put out too late to secure either verification or denial from the capital. When the telegrams of inquiry began to come in from the various stock exchanges the suspicion of stock jobbery spread. Individuals in various parts of the country were claiming to be in possession of private information. As there has been at no time a probability of Germany making its markets entirely free to American cereal products the falsity of alleged private information was easily settled. There has never been much secrecy about the matter. When the arrangements for raising the embargo on pork were concluded the lowering of grain duties by Germany was under discussion. Mr. von Mumm, who acted for his government in the absence of Minister Arco Valley, gave assurances that concessions would be made which would place the United States on the same footing with European nations with which Germany had special treaties or was making such. Until the details are settled at Berlin the exact concessions cannot be determined and no official announcement will be made.

THE CHINESE TROUBLES.

The next mail from China is expected with much interest and no little anxiety. It is expected to bring the answer from the Chinese government to the united demand on the part of the foreign ministers for protection and reparation. The state department officials do not dare hazard a guess as to the character of this answer. If it is true that the riots and outrages at Ichang were tacitly countenanced by the Chinese government officials, the answer from the imperial court at Peking may be startling in its character and results. Official and private dispatches seem to agree as to the character of the Ichang riots, and the action of the soldiery and the inaction of the commanding officers and those in authority.

Even when the British consulate was openly attacked and burned not a word was uttered by the Chinese officers to stay the riot. The phase of the affair considered very serious here is that the outrages were perpetrated with the sanction, if not by the orders, of the officers of the Chinese forces.

The condition of affairs that exists where a government does not dare to interfere with the actions of its subjects in order to protect foreign life and property does not indicate a satisfactory answer to the demands to which the United States was a party.

HANSEN'S FORGERIES.

Another Batch of Notes Turns Up—His Whereabouts a Mystery.

MILWAUKEE, Wis., Oct. 22.—The forgeries committed by M. R. Hansen, who used the name of George Hiles, of this city, now amount to $30,000, and it is believed that still more of the spurious paper will be found. The existence of three more fraudulent notes each for $5,000, was learned of tonight. They are held by Nels Johnson, of the firm of Johnson, Hill, & Co., Centralia; the First National and the Batavia banks of La Crosse. Nothing is known of Hansen's whereabouts, but some believe that he has fled to Norway, where he has relatives. The last heard of him was on Oct. 9, when he was at Rockford, Ill. He wrote to Mr. Hiles, from that place, saying he would be in Milwaukee last Sunday. Mr. Hiles has received the spurious notes from the La Crosse banks and says the forgery of his signature is very poor work. When the indorsement of the notes found at La Crosse was pronounced spurious, Hansen did a cool thing. He telegraphed the bank to send the notes to George Hiles, which was done, and by thus giving the impression that the matter was one capable of being satisfactorily explained, he succeeded in gaining time for himself.

TO VOTE NOV. 3.

South Dakota Pretty Sure to Call for a World's Fair Exhibit.

PIERRE, S. D., Oct. 23.—The people of South Dakota will vote on Nov. 3 on the question of an appropriation of $50,000 for world's fair purposes. The sentiment is rapidly changing in favor of an exhibit commendable to the state. The farmer legislature of last winter was generally in favor of a representation, but their ideas of the character of it were not up to the standard required by the magnificence of the state. Many were in favor of appropriating $10,000. Some wanted to vote for $25,000 and some would have voted for $40,000, but the pressure of outside lobbying for $50,000 was too strong for no sum less than $50,000 that between all parties and the members an adjournment sine die was had without any appropriation.

Happily nearly everybody now has his eyes open, and there seems to be a spontaneous movement toward doing something. The outlook is for a good enough vote to permit the Governor to call a special session of the legislature for the purpose of making an appropriation and to warrant the members voting for it. The present good crops have done much to encourage the people to do this.

Horse Notes.

Bud Doble has sold Nancy Hanks for $50,000.

Nancy Hanks has reduced her record six times this season. this way: 2:12½, 2:12¼, 2:12, 2:09¼, 2:09.

Direct 2:06, Allerton 2:09¼, Nancy Hanks 2:12, Manager, pacer, 2:11¼, Pat Downing 2:13¼, Mary Marshall 2:12¾, Charleston 2:15½, Monbars, two years, 2:20, are all inbred to Hambletonian 10.

Hal Edwards drove Sarcenet in his race at Mason City. Mr. Edwards is confident that Sarcenet is a great horse and told the writer that he was satisfied that with a few weeks' handling he could drive him in 2:16.

The seven heat race won by Guy at Terre Haute last week, is by far the fastest seven-heat race ever paced, the the time being 2:13½, 212¾, 2:13½, 2-12, 2:12, 2:16, 2:15¾; average, 2:13. 2:14. In this race Roy Wilkes met his first defeat since 1889

Storm left for Independence yesterday to enter the 2:15 pacing race. Storm was in good condition when he left Mason City having fully recovered from the lameness which caused him to be withdrawn in the pacing race on the Mason City track.

Local Sportsmen were somewhat disappointed last week to receive the intelligence that Delmarch, the great stallion, has been substituted at Lexington for Nancy Hanks in the race Thursday, Nancy was not in shape for the race, and has been off color in health for some time—so the dispatches stated.

Allerton won the race from Delmarch at Lexington, last week, in three straight heats. The last quarter of the last heat was trotted in the remarkable time of 31¼. It was generally conceded by the leading horsemen present that Allerton is several seconds better then than ever before and it was admitted by all, that had Nancy Hanks been able to trot with him she would have either been defeated or would have trotted the fastest race ever known.

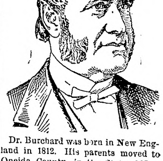
It is claimed that $50,000 a day is wagered by women at the Garfield Park race track in Chicago and that numbers of women faint away after every race. Also that women have been known to pawn their husband's clothing to get money to go to the track and gamble. So profitable has the business become to the management that they are arranging to put heaters into the grand stand and keep tired plugs pelting around the race track in the snow and slush all winter.

The name of Rev. W. F. Bacon, of Sabula, has been stricken from the Upper Iowa conference. Some time ago Mr. Bacon bought a horse for $150. He had it professionally trained, and it develoved so much speed and quality that he sold it for $1,500. With a part of this money he bought another good horse and placed it in training. It was entered in some local trots and won some money. Mr. Bacon was admonished to stop horse racing, but failed to heed the warning. At the conference, learning that he would have to sell his stable or go into bankruptcy.

Coon Rapids has three pastors who stand 6 feet 6 inches each. They can preach over the heads of their respective congregations.

REV. DR. SAMUEL D. BURCHARD.

The Clergyman Who is Said to Have "Defeated" Blaine.



Dr. Burchard was born in New England in 1812. His parents moved to Oneida County, in the State of New York. Young Burchard was of delicate constitution but with remarkable mental vigor. When he was 18 years of age he emigrated to Kentucky in the hope of finding restored health among the mountains. While supporting himself by teaching he prepared for and entered Central College. He was still at Danville, Ky., when the cholera scourge swept over the country. It was particularly virulent in that part of Kentucky. All through the reign of the disease young Burchard went from house to house nursing the sick, administrating medicine and speaking words of religious comfort in the ears of the dying. His reputation extended far and wide and in almost every town in Kentucky he addressed vast audiences on the subjects of temperance, religion and human rights. He was ordained a minister of the Presbyterian Church, and after some months he accepted a call to the Houston Street Church in New York City. This chuch afterward moved to West Thirteenth street. After laboring nearly forty years Dr. Burchard retired and was made President of the Rutgers Female College in New York. On October 30, 1884, at a convention of ministers at the Fith Avenue Hotel, New York, to help Blaine's canvass the Rev. Dr. Burchard delivered the address of welcome, in the course of which he said: "We are Republicans and don't propose to leave our party and identify ourselves with the party whose antecedents have been "Rum, Romanism and Rebellion." These last words are said to have defeated Blaine in the race for the Presidency in 1884.

Trying to Find a St. Paul Man.

WASHINGTON, OCT. 22.—Charles T. Miller, of St. Paul, brother-in-law of Bank President Dawson, of that city, is supposed to be in Washington. J. M. Lackey, Gen. Rosecrans' private secretary, has received a telegram from a friend in St. Paul, urging a thorough search for Miller, to appraise him of a calamity that has just befallen his mother, who has suffered a probably fatal stroke of paralysis at her home in St. Paul. The search has proved unsuccessful.

THE PRESIDENT'S PAY.

How Mr. Harrison Draws His Salary—Simple Proceeding.

Just how President Harrison is paid perhaps one man in a hundred knows. It is taken for granted, though, that the president gets his hands on his salary in some way and spends it very much after the fashion of other men.

The statutes of the United States fix the salary of the president and other public officials. Mr. Harrison is entitled to $50,000 a year, and is supposed to be paid quarterly. In fact he is not.

Assistant Secretary of the Treasury Crouns has charge of the payment of salaries, and once a month he sends to the division of accounts a document addressed to the secretary of the treasury in these words: "Please cause a warrant to be issued in favor of Benjamin Harrison, president of the United States, for the sum of $4,166.67, with which he is to be charged and held accountable under the following head of appropriations." The section of the statute is quoted and the document signed by the assistant secretary.

The warrant for this amount is then issued and recorded in the proper books, when it is sent to Treasurer Nebeker, who issues his draft on the United States treasury in favor of the president. This draft is no different from any other, save that it is in the name of the president alone. If the chief magistrate is in the city it is sent to the White House by a special messenger and delivered to the president or his private secretary.

After the president puts his name on the back of it the draft becomes negotiable paper, the same as any other, and is sent by him to the Columbia Bank, where it is deposited to his credit and becomes a part of his private account. If he is out of the city the draft is sent to the president by mail. It happened that on the 18th of July Gen. Crook was going down to Cape May, and the draft for that month's salary was given him to convey to the president.

There is no monthly accounting kept with the president or vice president, as with other officials, but at the close of his term a final settlement is made between the treasury department and the executive.—Washington Post.

Too Much Haste.

Gazing upon the rugged mountain scenery from the deck of a Hudson river steamer a young lady remarked: "How strange that all this beautiful world should have been created and finished in the short space of six days!"

"It does look as if it wasn't finished yet," remarked a matter-of-fact man. "It looks for all the world as if it had been thrown together in a hurry. It would have looked much more workmanlike if it had taken three or four weeks to finish the job properly. Nothing that is done in a hurry is well done."—Texas Siftings.

It has been discovered that almanacs date back to the year 100 A. D.

Rest.

My feet are wearied and my hands are tired,
My soul oppressed—
And I desire what I have long desired—
Rest—only rest.

'Tis hard to toil—when toil is almost vain
In barren ways;
'Tis hard to sow and never garner grain
In harvest days.

The burden of my days is hard to bear,
But God knows best;
And I have prayed—but vain has been my prayer
For rest—sweet rest.

'Tis hard to plant in spring and never reap
The autumn yield;
'Tis hard to till, and when tilled to weep
O'er fruitless field.

And so I cry, a weak and human cry,
So heart oppressed;
And I sigh a weak and human sigh
For rest—for rest.

My way has wound across the desert years,
And cares infest
My path, and through the flowing of hot tears
I pine—for rest.

'Twas always so: when but a child I laid
On mother's breast
My wearied little head; e'en then I prayed
As now—for rest.

And I am restless still; 'twill soon be o'er;
For down the west
Life's sun is setting, and I see the shore
Where I shall rest.

NOT AFRAID OF GHOSTS.

Clarity—by the way, she was baptized Clarita, only her mother chose to Yankeefy it—was a very pretty girl. A smart girl, too, and a quick one.

And that is why she was always busy at home or in other peoples' houses at the trade by which she earned her living, besides dressing herself so prettily that no summer boarder could outdo her. How she got the latest styles out there at Cross Sticks no one could think; but she did it.

No wonder that Will Sheers, who kept the drug store in the village, fell in love with her! It was for her sake that he hired to her mother—a praiseworthy widow, fond of telling the story of her husband's failure to any one who would listen—a wing of the building in which he kept his store—a snug little affair of three rooms, for which he had no use, being a bachelor.

The rooms directly over the store, which were large and handsome, remained vacant, which led the village to suppose that the druggist intended to marry shortly.

When Mrs. Munn had moved into the little end wing it was but a step from the store door to the widow's flat doorstep, and Dr. Sheers spent much of his time there, especially in the evening, and people had begun to say that it was a "splendid thing for Clarity," when the two Misses Shepherd came to board with Mrs. Finn, with whom Dr. Sheers boarded.

Mrs. Finn advertised for summer boarders every year, under the hallucination that Cross Sticks was "the country," and she always caught a few victims, who sat on the porch and fanned away the mosquitoes, and took walks to the post office, and went on picnics to the frog-pond in the suburbs and looked at very distant mountains through field-glasses, and were otherwise as rural as possible.

Before they left in the fall the youngest Miss Shepherd was engaged to Dr. Sheers.

She was older than he. She was sharp of voice and elbows; but she had inherited a fortune from her grandmother, and then, as Mrs. Finn said, "she ran after him, and would hev him whether he would or no."

Meanwhile Clarity went on dressmaking and showed no signs of regretting her truant lover; and when Mrs. Munn proposed giving up the rooms forbad her to do so with the sternness with which daughters forbid their mothers to carry out their own ideas in this the nineteenth century.

"Why, ma, every one would think we felt cut up about it!" said Clarity.

"I do!" said Mrs. Mun; "I haven't felt worse since your pa failed."

"I don't care whom he marries, I'm sure," said Clarity. "And this is the cheapest place, to be so pretty, that we can find."

One day from her window she saw the bride and groom return to take possession of their newly furnished rooms.

For a while the bride and groom seemed very comfortable. New plate-glass windows were put into the store, and a wonderful soda-fountain was introduced. There was a looking-glass between the rows of boxes, and a portiere was hung at the door that opened into the back room. A little carriage in which Mrs. Sheers drove her sister to pay calls on her friends added luster to the establishment.

Suddenly a cloud arose. Mrs. Sheers was ill. There was a consultation. Shortly after that there was crape on the door. The doctor was a widower.

However, the day after the anniversary of his wife's funeral Dr. Sheers assumed a light hat, had his hair cut and his mustache waxed, put a rose in his buttonhole and called on Clarity Munn. Shortly afterward these two were openly engaged to be married.

And again things seemed to be going on well, at least "very well, considering," when people began to notice that Clarity was pale, that she was growing thin, that she cried over her work; and at last there was a rumor that she intended to "break" with Dr. Sheers.

"They're talking of it all over Cross Sticks, Clarity," Mrs. Munn said, "and you do look most miserable. What is the matter?"

"It's dreadful," said Clarity. "He's fond of me and I am of him, and you'd be so comfortable. He promises everything, and my heart is broken, but I dare not marry him; oh, I dare not!" and her eyes grew solemn and she looked over her shoulder.

"Why?" gasped the widow.

"She haunts me—his first wife, you know," said Clarity, "and says she will kill me on my wedding day. Oh, I am not crazy, ma!"

"I'm not afraid of ghosts," said Mrs. Munn. "I thought you had more spirit. Why, before your pa failed I found a burglar in my room robbing my jewel-box, and I collared him. I thought you took after me and had some spirit, Clarity."

"You cannot collar a ghost," sobbed Clarity.

"You can try," said Mrs. Munn. "Now, what I ask of you is to take my folding bed in the parlor to-night, and let me sleep in your bed up-stairs, and if she that was Mrs. Sheers appears to me I'll make her come to terms."

That night Mrs. Munn, in the little upper room, put out her lamp, hid a dark-lantern behind the pillow and awaited events.

The clock struck—11—12—and nothing happened. At 12:15 a curious noise was heard under the bed.

A groan followed—a voice, and it sounded very much like Mrs. Sheers' voice, whispered: "Clarity Munn, you shall not have my husband!"

For a moment Mrs. Munn felt faint. It was all true, then!

Indeed, it was far, far worse than seeing a burglar, even to hear that voice. And now—now! Yes! Slowly, solemnly arose from behind the footboard a figure all in white. Mrs. Munn covered her head with the quilt.

"You are right to quail before me," said a voice. "I claim my husband for my own. Marry him, and you die!"

It was the voice of Mrs. Sheers, it seemed to the old lady. She had always disliked it. Now it irritated her and helped her to be brave. Making one great effort, she sprung to her feet and faced the ghost.

The ghost retired. Mrs. Munn followed. It struck her that she had frightened the spirit more than it had frightened her. And, stretching out her hand, she grabbed the ghost by the collar, as she had the burglar. Her face was close to its pallid face now, and her blood curdled in her veins as she fancied that she recognized the sharp nose, small mouth and flat forehead of the late Mrs. Sheers amid the folds of the ghostly head-dress. But the thing did not vanish. It was quite substantial.

"I believe I've materialized you," said Mrs. Munn as she crowded the ghost in the corner and reached for the dark-lantern which she had hidden under her pillow and opened the slide. In a moment more she had pulled away the white wrappings and stood over a sharp-featured woman in a heliotrope-colored gown, who crouched and shivered in a corner—Miss Selina Shepherd, whose resemblance to her sister vanished when one saw her red hair, for Mrs. Sheers' hair had been black, either by nature or by art. Opinions varied as to that.

"So it is you," said Mrs. Munn—"you that have been frightening my Charity out of marrying your sister's widower! I suppose she'd have gone on thinking you a ghost forever. But you've got me to deal with now. How did you get in?"

"Oh, Mrs. Munn, have mercy!" Selina moaned. "Sister left everything to him, and I'm to be turned out of house and home. It was just life and death to me that he shouldn't marry."

"You didn't want him yourself, then?" asked Mrs. Munn.

"No," said Selina; "no more than he wants me. I meant to keep house and be his sister; and I don't know how to earn my living. Now he'll be furious and hate me."

"Miss Selina," said Mrs. Munn, "how did you get in here?"

"A trap door in the corner opens on a pair of stairs to the drug store. This used to be a storeroom," sobbed Selina. "It bolts on the other side."

"I'll see it is nailed up," said Mrs. Munn. "Now we may come to terms. I'll tell Clarity, but neither of us will tell the doctor or anybody else. Stop haunting and be friendly and Clarity won't let the doctor send you away. Seeing that he has got your sister's money, that will be but fair. Only, the moment Clarity is tormented I tell my story."

Miss Selina stopped sobbing and scrambled to her feet.

"Agreed," she said. "Women who have had hard times ought to feel for each other."

Having lighted the ghost down the ladder and thrown her white vestments after her, Mrs. Munn put a trunk over the trap-door and retired to dream of weddings.

After Clarity married Dr. Sheers people used to say how wonderful it was that Miss Selina received her brother-in-law's second wife so pleasantly, and how curious it was that she was so friendly with Mrs. Munn.—Fireside Companion.

Discouraging a Wife.

"Well, sir, what can we do for you to-day?" queried a crockery dealer in Newark of a man who dropped in the other morning.

"You have fruit cans?"

"Yes, sir."

"The price has gone up?"

"Considerably so."

"They are worth a dollar apiece?"

"Oh, no! no! That would be outrageous."

"Well, I want you to do me a favor. My wife will be in here in about an hour asking after fruit-cans. She's bound to do up two bushels of fall peaches. Tell her that cans have gone up to $10 a dozen, peaches to $6 a bushel, and that you've heard there was a corner in the sugar market and an advance of 200 per cent."—N. Y. World.

Only the Finger Tips.

A woman's make-up is a fearful and wonderful thing because there is so much in it and so many drugs and chemicals are involved. Take, for instance, the simple process of manicuring and see to what an art it is reduced.

First the finger tips must be soaked in perfumed water, then they must be carefully cleaned with an orange-wood stick to help. After that comes the red paste, which must be thoroughly washed off. Following these is a pink powder, then a perfumed soap with a felt polisher. Lastly is the enamel, which is brightened by the brisk dash with a kid polisher. So much for the finger tips. Will any one dare to reveal the rest of the toilet mysteries?—St. Louis Post-Dispatch.

THE PARAGUAYAN CAPITAL.

Asuncion Is a Town That Is Full of Surprises and Contrasts.

In Paraguay there is but one town—Asuncion, the capital—says Theodore Child in Harper's Magazine. When the traveler has seen this city he has seen the quintessence of all that is fine in the republic. Asuncion is charmingly situated on gently undulating ground, rising to a considerable height above the river, which makes a bend here and forms a bay, in which are anchored a few steamers, many schooners, a white Brazilian gunboat and two or three hulks, while close to the shore are some long wood rafts and cedar logs. To the northeast of the port, which consists merely of a wooden pier, simple quays, and the usual buildings of custom house and warehouses on a small scale, the beach for some distance forms a broad, level stretch of green meadows, bounded by steep red sandstone cliffs, which are crowned by the silhouets of the principal edifices of the town—the palace of Lopez, the Cabildo, the barracks, the dome of the Pantheon, the church of San Francisco, and below this church, perched literally on the side of the cliff, the suburb, or quarter, called La Chacarita. All along the shore are groups of women washing clothes, with, in the background, a flourishing growth of trees and jungle, and the town itself appears to be surrounded and interspersed with verdure.

The view of Asuncion from the river is delightful, but the view from the interior is still more so, particularly from the high ground of La Cancha, a sort of hotel and pleasure resort, situated a short distance to the east. From this point the spectacle is most fascinating. The outer zone of the town consists of a belt of low wooded hills, dotted with cottages and yellow with orange trees. The inner zone, more level but still undulating, slopes toward the river, and appears covered with buildings, from which emerge tall church towers and here and there groups of trees; beyond this is the silvery river winding along between islands, jungles and shallows, and in the background is the dark blue interminable flatness of the Paraguayan Chaco. There are few towns in the world more picturesquely situated than Asuncion, and few urban panoramas that offer a more beautiful distribution of soft hills, rich vegetation, pretty river scenery and grand and limitless horizon.

The town is full of surprises and contrasts. This hotel of La Cancha, for instance, almost within a stone's throw of the virgin forest, is lighted by electricity. The streets of Asuncion are, with two exceptions, unpaved, and in some of the side streets cows may be seen grazing, but all are lined with tall posts and cross-trees that carry innumerable telegraph wires, and in some of the old oil lanterns have been replaced by electric lamps. The town is laid out rectangularly in cuadras, the streets running in one direction to the port and in the other toward the wooded country. These streets all go up and down hill; they have high sidewalks, more or less paved; but the roadway is generally a sort of deep and rugged valley of fine red sand, with here and there a protruding rock. A proof of the condition of the streets of Asuncion is given by the fact that there are no public or private carriages; the only vehicles that can circulate are ox-carts and high vehicles drawn by three or four mules. Pack-mules, donkeys and riding-horses are also used, but for light goods and passengers the great and indispensable conveyance is the tramway, which bears the name of conductor universal. The streets go on and on to the limits of the town, the houses and huts becoming less and less frequent, but the deep, sandy road continues between forests, orange trees and innumerable varieties of flowering shrubs and creepers. The telegraph posts continue likewise and with them the tram-lines and the cars, with their teams of ill-used mules, their dark-skinned drivers and conductors, who talk Guarani and barely understand a few words of Spanish.

One wonders what can be the use of a tramway through the forest. At last, however, after running some five miles, the cars stop at a spot called Villa Morra, where the streets are indicated by finger-posts stuck in the open fields. There are a few country houses here, a manufactory of palm-oil, a hotel, and at a short distance the church and cemetery of the Recoleta. The landscape is beautiful and the vegetation and flora of a variety and richness beyond description; the roads are lined with orange trees; every hut nestles in groves of orange, banana, lime, fig and palm trees; the hedges and fences are formed of large cactuses, convolvuli and lianos. As for the cottages and huts, they are of very primitive architecture, most of them being built of mud and cane, with bark roofs; a few only are of brick, with tile roofs, and still fewer have more than one room, one door and one small window, shaded in front by a veranda supported on palm tree pillars. In the town, too, the old houses all have verandas or long colonades in front that cover the sidewalk and offer protection from the tropical sun. The more modern houses, on the other hand, have no verandas; they are like those of Buenos Ayres, and their facades are over-ornamented with stucco and elaborate iron gratings.

A Chinese Bone-Setter.

An American mining engineer in China writes to the N. Y. Sun an interesting and curious description of a Chinese bone-setter. A man had fractured his leg, and insisted on being attended by a bone-setter. Accordingly that functionary was summoned, and after looking at the man he mounted a mule and started off. Three days later he returned. Without making any attempt to put the bones in place and bandage the leg, he made the Chinaman drink about a gallon of a mixture he had prepared. Then the patient died.

THE CELLAR.

Some Hints About Its Arrangement.

When the housekeeper has bought, built, or hired her house, after due consideration of the family needs and tastes, and after careful examination of the locality and construction of the chosen home, her earliest attention should be directed to the cellar, as that part of the home which is most often neglected, and where order and convenience combined add no small amount to the comfort and healthfulness of all parts of the house.

The arrangement of the cellar takes time and attention rather than any great outlay of money. The windows should first be seen to. A stuffy, unventilated cellar, full of dead air, is an abomination. The windows should be so hung that they can be removed from the inside, and during all but the extreme winter months should be taken out, and even then in mild days they should be opened in the middle of the day. The outside of the windows should be protected by galvanized wire window-netting, costing two and a half cents the square foot. A heavier, coarser-meshed quality can be used instead, if great strength is desired. This quality costs six cents the square foot. The hatchways of city houses are troublesome in cold weather. Both the rear and the front hatchways admit a great deal of wind during the winter, in spite of the wooden covers that are fitted to them, and make the kitchen and dining-room floors draughty and cold. This can be remedied by covering the iron grating over each hatchway with several folds of old carpeting or furniture sacking, and then fitting the cover down tightly. The hatchway on the sunny side of the house must be frequently opened for air. The cellar ceiling and walls should be thoroughly whitewashed, two heavy coats being enough.

All city cellars, and many in the country towns and villages, are cemented, which under most conditions is the safest and cleanest flooring. But in the country, where the ground is not poisoned from leakages of sewers or the foul gases of cesspools, and where, yet farther, the ground is dry and sandy, a cellar bottom of well-beaten earth is not unwholesome, and has a mysterious capacity for keeping fruits and vegetables beyond that of cemented cellars. Such a cellar should have boards for walks to bins, barrels, and cupboard, to keep the house-mother from fretting over the dirt "tracked up." If these boards are occasionally turned over when swept, there will be no trouble from dampness or "saw bugs." Raising them up slightly from the ground by inch cleats nailed to the under side of the boards is another and better method.

In a cellar where there is a furnace, it is a great help to household management to have a portion of the cellar divided from the furnace portion by a tight board partition, with a padlocked door opening into it. The boards used may be rough and cheap, costing two cents a foot; but the partition must be tight, so as not to admit the warm air from the furnace. Under ordinary circumstances the expense need not be over ten dollars, and in many cases even less.

In this cold cellar the vegetables and apples, butter and preserves, may be kept, and even in the city the uncomfortable habit of living from hand to mouth might be changed to a great degree. Here the time-honored vinegar barrel or keg may have its place, giving out its supply of "pure cider" vinegar whenever needed. Near by should be the swinging shelf and cupboard, and the old-time feeling of plenty and comfort, which the memory of the well-filled cellars of country homes always brings, would return to the household.—Agnes B. Ormsbee, in Harper's Bazar.

A Corporation Catechism.

Question. What is a corporation?

Answer. An association founded for the purpose of issuing stock, which the first holders get for nothing and the second holders pay a premium for.

Q. What is a charter member?

A. A person let into a corporation on the ground floor, while the dear public has to climb a ladder and get in at the second-story windows.

Q. What is common stock?

A. That kind that is lying around loose when the corporation starts business.

Q. What is preferred stock?

A. The kind everybody prefers to have after the charter members have unloaded all their common.

Q. What are dividends?

A. The small percentages of the stockholders' money which they never get back again.

Q. What are bonds?

A. Fetters for tying up the money of those capitalists who are too smart to buy stock.

Q. What is a receiver?

A. A gentleman with cool nerves who comes in at a certain stage of the game and takes all within reach.

Q. What is a receiver's certificate?

A. A paper which certifies to stockholders and bondholders that the receiver is a bigger man than all of them put together.

Q. What is a "construction" account?

A. A convenient device for accounting for the money which the dear public knows it has paid over, and which the corporation can't produce on demand.

Q. What is a balance sheet?

A. A mathematical demonstration that two and two make seven.

What is a report?

A. A legal formula, whereby a corporation inquires whether the public authorities can see any green in its eye.

Q. What do the public authorities require of a corporation?

A. That when it bleeds the dear public it shall do so with as little pain as possible to the victim.

Q. And what redress has the victim if the corporation defies the law?

A. Profanity.—Kate Field's Washington.

IS IT GREATER THAN NIAGARA?

Mr. Bryant Going to Labrador to Explore the Big Cataract.

The mystery which has always hung over the Grand falls, in the interior of Labrador, is to be cleared away at last, and in a few months the scientific world will know whether the falls in Grand or Hamilton river are the greatest in the world or whether the previous accounts have been greatly exaggerated. Henry G. Bryant, a member of the Philadelphia bar, accompanied by Prof. Keniston of Georgetown university, is now on his way to visit the falls.

Only two white men have ever seen the falls, so far as is known, and they both place the height at 2,000 feet. Both of the men stood high in the service of the Hudson Bay company, and though they saw the falls at different times their accounts agree in nearly every particular. Maclean, the first to reach the scene, conducted an expedition into the interior in 1839 and was stopped by these falls. Kennedy reached them under guidance of an Iroquois Indian who had spent most of his life in Labrador. The native Indians give the falls a wide berth, owing to a tradition long current among them that they are haunted by evil spirits and that no man can look upon them and live.

Above the falls the river is said to be 500 yards broad, contracting to 50 yards at the falls themselves. If this account be true, then in the whole world there is no other fall having such a volume of water descending at a bound from such a stupendous height. Niagara's volume of water is far greater, but its height is only 164 feet. The famous falls of Zambesi are but 100 feet. In the Yosemite valley there is a fall of 2,550 feet, but this is broken into three leaps, and the volume of water is not equal to that of the Grand falls of Labrador. Thus, taking into account the combination of height and volume, these Grand falls of Labrador throw all others into the shade. A fall of 2,000 feet has generally been regarded as utterly inconceivable, however, and various efforts have been made to verify the reports of Maclean and Kennedy.

Mr. Bryant has carefully studied the situation and has made his preparations with so much care that his success is regarded as assured. Besides himself and Prof. Keniston Mr. Bryant hopes to take about eight Indians and a white man for guide, if he can get one. The journey up the river will be made in canoes, which must be carried around the many rapids and falls.

A Whisky Geyser.

Editor Cahill of the Oakland, Cal., Tribune says the overflow in the Colorado desert isn't much of a wonder. He tells an Examiner reporter this startling tale: "After I had neglected to make a fortune in manufacturing wine after the Kilkenny theory in Anaheim urgent necessity and the sheriff made me move on. So, with nothing much on my mind or my back, I went over to the Apache reservation in Arizona to live on an old Trinity college friend who was an Indian agent. I found my chum in a state of alarmed surprise. His Indians were all drunk and he hadn't sold them any liquor. And again, still more strange to relate, instead of being fighting drunk with a desire for scalps and mutilation they were just pleasantly jagged. The agent and I spent three days in trying to discover the source of supply but all we could get out of the Indians was:

"'Umph! Big drunk come again.'

"At last, however, by giving a half-tipsy interpreter and a rolling scout a box of cartridges and seven red poker chips, they unburdened themselves enough to say: 'Cum, see!'

"We cum seed' after them about three miles out into the bad lands. There we found a lake at least a mile across with a fringe of dancing Indians around its entire margin. No lake had ever been seen there before. The water was a light brown color and exhaled a pleasing odor which could be smelled a mile away. The interpreter dipped up some of it and offered it to us to drink. It was liquor—good, hard stuff—something like the poteen of my boyhood's days. You don't believe it, eh? Why, the phenomenon is easy enough of scientific explanation. In pre-historic ages all that country was thickly covered with the cactus from which mescal is distilled. This growth was covered with water and mud in time, and the heat and chemical forces of the earth's interior worked upon it the process of distillation something as gas and oil are formed beneath the earth's crust. Then some 'drastic lift of pent volcanic fires' heaved it up to meet the air. It was a whisky geyser, for it all disappeared within a month—just as the agent and I were arranging to pipe it into Phœnix."

Wanted to See Yoneral Alyor.

A big Scandinavian sailor from Wisconsin floated into Detroit, having decided that farming wouldn't do for him any longer and that he must get back to the water. He hadn't been in town more than five hours before some smooth citizen managed to get his money away from him. This left Ole in bad shape and he determined that some one ought to help him out. He therefore approached a policeman and inquired:

"Mester Offser, ay laike to knau vaer ay faind Yenral Alyer."

"What do you want of Gen. Alger?" asked the officer, glancing suspiciously at the ragged-looking chap.

"Val, Ay baen robbed, en Ay voant to see som faller," returned the son of Thor.

"Well, what do you expect Gen. Alger to do about it?" asked the officer, beginning to smile.

"Ay doan't knau, bet Ay haer Oukle Yerry Rusk ope een Visconsen tal mae Yeu Alyer baen yenial, yooyal yantelmans, an Ay tawk Ay voant to see ham."

He was finally induced to make his complaint at police headquarters.—Detroit Tribune.

Improved Passenger Service.

Under the new time schedule of "the North-Western Line," C., St. P., M. & O. Ry., all passenger trains of this line make the trip between St. Paul and Chicago in less than 14 hours.

The Pullman and Wagner Vestibuled Limited, leaving St. Paul at 7:30 p. m. makes the trip to Chicago in 13½ hours and from Chicago to St. Paul in 13 hours and 25 minutes.

The Daylight Express leaving St Paul at 7:45 a. m. makes the trip to Chicago in 13 hours and 50 minutes and from Chicago to St. Paul in 13 hours and 45 minutes.

This is the only line running all its trains in less than 14 hour between St. Paul and Chicago, and while this time is quick trains don't have to run at as high speed to make their time as on other lines, because this is shorter than any other line.

In addition to these facts this is the only line by which connections are assure in Chicago with all fast line trains from Chicago to the East and South in the morning and at night.

Note.—Fares by this line are always as low as by any other.

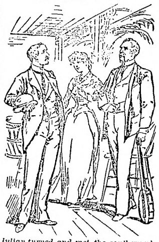
CHAPTER XVI.

THE SHADOW OF EVIL.



Julian turned and met the southerner's concentrated stare.

It was some weeks after the attempted assassination of Talbot that Mr. Roosevelt, Mr. Largely and Edgar Julian returned from Florida. After all, they had been outgeneraled and beaten by Ellis. Largely had attempted to get a restraining order on the affidavit and bill drawn up by Julian, but Ellis had avoided the whole matter by persuading Largely's Floridian coadjutors that it would be safer to tie their faith to a southern man rather than to an adventurer from Illinois. Mr. Roosevelt had interposed with a proposition of compromise, which, being favorable to Sir Edmond Kane's schemes, received the support of all the foreigners, and was finally, with some modifications, accepted by Ellis; but the victory was with the young mountaineer, giving him control of a strong combination of roads which, in the future, would be of immense value.

"I never saw a fellow so full of expedients and so popular with everybody," said Largely to Mr. Roosevelt during the course of the adjustment.

"He was the man you were going to crush inside of twenty-four hours," replied Mr. Roosevelt.

"You thought he had no backing," added Julian.

Largely winced, and rolling a cigar across his mouth from one corner to the other, chuckled dryly and said:

"He is like an eel, when you get him you can't hold him. Talk about a Yankee being slick!"

"I shall never again think of a bill in equity without recollecting how easily he punctured your injunction scheme," said Julian, with something like harmless exultation in his tone.

"After all," interposed Mr. Roosevelt, "Ellis has done nothing not strictly honorable, and he deserves all he has gained."

"Oh, I admire the fellow. Talk of western cheek and impudence—why he's worse than a lightning rod man!" responded Largely, "he talks his way right through everything. As for lying, his sort of misrepresentation can hardly be called that, but he promises everything that he thinks will please."

"The people like him and honor him greatly," said Mr. Roosevelt. "He makes friends of high and low."

"Yes," laughed Largely, "he has made friends even out of us! Here we sit marshaling his various qualities and attainments, while he walks off with the prize."

To Edgar Julian the calamity that had fallen upon Colonel Warren Talbot presented nothing especially strange or incomprehensible. He considered it the result of some private quarrel, growing out of a business transaction perhaps. Of course he knew nothing of the circumstances that have been detailed touching the conduct of Ellis, nor of the mysterious incidents of Rosalie's moonlight walk with Talbot, and he did not dream of any possible connection of Miss Chenier with the matter.

Some things he had ordered came from Chicago during his stay at Jacksonville; among them was the Provence cross. One day he took this, and without any preliminary words let the gold chain attached to it fall around Rosalie's neck.

"Thus," said he, turning to Mrs. Roosevelt, "I restore to Miss Chenier the ancestral cross of her family."

In the midst of her recent trouble Rosalie had actually forgotten her dreams of Provence and of the souvenir that Julian had promised to fetch. Now, as she glanced at the antique cross and chain, a rush of strange sensations overcame her. A deep blush flowed into her cheeks, and ebbing almost instantly left her face intensely pale.

Mrs. Roosevelt rose and went to her niece. She had heard from Rosalie the story of this cross, and in fact she had heard it many a time in her own young girlhood. It was one of the Chenier traditions.

"It is not a bad ornament," said Julian, taking a step backward and looking critically at the dull gold as it lay across the beads of red insect amber on the girl's white throat. "That dent the peasant told me was caused by his hoe or mattock, or whatever he dug with, striking it; but I like to imagine it was caused by an arrow or spear in some glorious fight of the olden time." He said this knowing that Rosalie would like to hear it. He watched her face closely. She looked up into his eyes with nearly the old simplicity and naivete. Her cheeks grew rosy again. He could see her imagination take fire and flame in those deep pure eyes.

Mrs. Roosevelt examined the cross attentively.

"I do not know if it is genuine," she said; "but it has all the appearance of an antique thing."

"Oh, it is genuine," said Julian quickly; "it was dug up just a few days before I got it. I gave no antiquarian a chance; so soon as I saw it I bought it, and made the finder agree not to tell any one about discovering or selling it. I was afraid of litigation."

"But you don't mean to give it to me," said Rosalie so sincerely and with such evident earnestness that it caused him to laugh.

"Why, that's all I wanted it for," he just as frankly replied; "I couldn't possibly put it to any use for myself. Then, you know, I promised to fetch you a memento from Chateau Chenier."

Rosalie looked at Aunt Marguerite as if mutely asking a question, but that very charming old lady did not notice it.

"How papa would be pleased to see it!" continued Rosalie, toying with the ornament.

"You might send it to him," suggested Mrs. Roosevelt.

"I should be afraid it might get lost or stolen on the way," replied Rosalie.

"And I wish you to wear it for its memory's sake; don't ever take it off, Miss Chenier, it will bring you good fortune," exclaimed Julian. "Promise me you won't ever take it off, will you?" This last sentence was more a trembling prayer than a light remark. Before Mrs. Roosevelt could formulate a clever sentence with which to prevent it, Rosalie answered:

"Yes, I will always wear it if you desire it. You couldn't ask anything easier as a return for your generous thoughtfulness in bringing it to me."

Mrs. Roosevelt caught her breath and looked helplessly at her niece.

Julian recognized in Rosalie's voice the ring of utter simplicity; it was very charming, but just then he would have preferred a touch of artfulness or even coquetry. It seemed to him that it was high time for her to understand what he meant and to leave off this childish way of literal interpretation. In fact, consideration of this Provencal cross had made her an unsophisticated mountain maid again.

A young man who is thoroughly in love sees many evidences of originality, individuality and rare personality in his sweetheart, just as a mother sees those qualities in her babe. Julian, as he fondly gazed down upon the girl's bright shapely head and prettily drooping shoulders, thought her the very flower of womanly beauty.

An hour later, when Mrs. Roosevelt had gone to the parlor to entertain some old lady visitors, Julian enticed Rosalie to the veranda. Northern persons in the south enjoy to the full the luxury of those broad verandas. The novelty of sitting in the open air in midwinter has its charm, disconnected from any influence of vines and trees and flowers and the balm of semitropical breezes. The southerners laugh at the extremes to which northern people go in response to the warm influence of the climate, as, for instance, when youthful dandies affect the cool, airy garb of midsummer in January, or when young ladies go upon the streets in white dresses and watering place hats.

But Julian was not aware of any other motive than a desire to be quite alone with Rosalie when he drew her to the veranda. He took the banjo along and asked her to sing. When in a girlish, almost gleeful, voice she began Julian joined in with his clear tenor voice, she stopped in the midst and said:

"Why, where did you learn my little song?"

"A French artist with whom I spent some time at Agen was all the while singing it," he replied. "It is a fascinating jingle. I wonder if it ever was a Provencal song?"

"I don't know," she replied: "papa has sung it ever since I can remember, but always in French."

"I think I should like your father very much. I want some excuse for going to see him as I pass through north Georgia on my way home. Can't you invent some good reason?"

"Are you going soon?" she quickly inquired. The thought made her homesick.

"Not very soon," he replied; "not if—if I can help it."

He stammered because there came a rush of thoughts. His going or staying was dependent upon her answer to a question he meant to submit for her consideration. He looked into her inscrutable young face, and was afraid; so much hung upon the outcome of his purposed venture; if she should refuse him, what then? He saw that the color of his life would be caught from her answer. But he could not procrastinate—push and rush was the spirit of his education. Now or never had been his motto.

He had drawn his chair close to hers.

"I need not stay much longer," he added; "all my business here is measurably finished, and I have affairs in Chicago that will soon demand my attention; but I cannot go before Mr. Ellis returns from Florida with Sir Edmond Kane to close up the compromise we have effected."

He saw her start as he mentioned Ellis' name; the blood slowly left her cheek; her eyelids drooped sadly; thoughtful creases came in her forehead under the shining fringe of curls. A vague pang of jealousy shot through his breast.

"Miss Chenier," he murmured, "when I sat upon the wall of the old chateau at Provence, as the sweet shades of twilight gathered round me, I often heard your voice as if you were calling me back. Did you ever want to see me while I was gone?"

She looked up quickly, wholly coming back from painful recollections, but her eyes fell before his troubled, burning gaze.

"I have loved you from the first," he added passionately, "and I must tell you so. You"——

"Hush, sir, hush—you must not—I can not listen—please!"

She put forth her hand as if to thrust him far away from her, but the tender quaver of her voice doubled his ecstasy.

"You have already heard," he exclaimed vehemently; "what more could I say? I love you and that is all. It means everything worth living for."

He was a powerful advocate. She looked helplessly at him, a blinding mist filling her eyes. He took her hand and leaned toward her. She started and stared past him. Frank Ellis stood in the doorway opening upon the veranda. She almost leaped to her feet. The banjo fell on the floor with a resonant clang. Julian turned and met the southerner's concentrated stare with very little show of embarrassment. He rose and made a movement toward greeting him cordially; but Ellis loftily ignored him. Rosalie offered her hand, and said:

"We have been speaking of you, or Mr. Julian has. Will you sit down here—we have found it delightfully airy and cool."

Julian picked up the banjo with one hand, offering Ellis the other. He had not noticed the latter's attempt to avoid him. The hand was not taken, however, and with a quick sense of resentment it was withdrawn. Ellis did not sit down. He stood as if enveloped in a dark frown, his eyes gloomily questioning Rosalie's face. He seemed to be repressing a great rush of anger or some other wicked emotion. His face was a lawless, almost reckless one for the moment. A mood of the mountain life was upon him. Rosalie felt rather than saw this, for she had merely glanced at his face. In her own mind all the strange dark thoughts of the past few weeks had leaped up anew.

Julian looked back and forth, from the man to the girl and from her to him, a weight gathering in his bosom. As a lawyer he had been a keen student of human nature and of human faces. He was conscious of the existence of a common thought between these two: it greatly irritated him. He was not prepared for such an interruption. Then, too, Ellis' bearing was intolerable: it was evidently meant to be insulting.

Such a situation could not last long. Ellis rallied and said to Rosalie:

"Your uncle, Mr. Roosevelt—shall I probably find him at his office?"

"Yes. I believe he and Mr. Largely are there; but won't you sit down with us awhile?" she responded, with an effort to be bright and cheerful.

"No, I will come back, perhaps," he said. He flashed a glance at Julian, and bowing low before Rosalie in the old southern way, walked through the hall and out of the house. The true impression of this short interview is hard to give in words. In Rosalie's mind it had a significance which she did not like to consider. She had read in the face of Ellis some dark resolve which might end in another deed of revenge. She turned to Julian, pale and trembling, and laid her hand upon his arm, then hesitated a moment. Finally:

"Promise to ask me no questions and I will tell you something," she quaveringly murmured.

"Of course I promise," he promptly replied, a presentiment of evil falling duskily into his mind.

"You must watch Mr. Ellis; he is a very, very dangerous man," she added, her voice falling into a whisper, which thrilled him strangely.

"Oh, that will be all right, I shall not trouble him," said Julian, in a great hurry to return to the point where Ellis had interrupted him. "You must tell me now if you love me, Rosalie—Miss Chenier. The whole joy of my life depends on it—do not refuse me—answer me, tell me now."

"I cannot think now—I do not know what to say to you," she exclaimed. "Let me go, please—let me be all alone for awhile. You must not talk to me about—about this now."

She took a step or two backward as if going to run away, then stopped and added, "I am dizzy," putting her hand to her head; "I am faint."

He sprang to her side, but she pushed him away, more with a gesture than a touch.

"Excuse me—I am ill—let me go to my room," she managed to say; and turning into the hall tottered up stairs.

To Julian all this was surpassingly strange. He could see no cause for such excitement. He was standing all bewildered, gazing up the great winding stairs when Mrs. Roosevelt came into the hall, her visitors having gone.

"I believe Miss Chenier is sick—I think you had better go to her room," he said. Then he took his hat and went out to walk and think. He was little prepared for what was soon to follow.

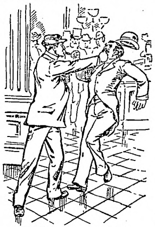
CHAPTER XVII.

OUT FROM THE SHOULDER.

Edgar Julian put a cigar in his mouth without lighting it, and contemplatively gazed at the brick or shell sidewalks as he passed along, aimlessly strolling in the breezy shade of the trees. Somehow he felt that Rosalie loved him, notwithstanding her strange action. It was useless for him to attempt to unravel just then the mystery of her excitement or of Ellis' unwonted impoliteness. Between himself and the latter he knew of no reason for a quarrel. In their business transactions Ellis had had things quite his own way, and there had never been any but the kindest words between them. Surely the man could not be so foolish as to fall in a passion because he was addressing Miss Chenier! The difference between the north and the south at this point had not occurred to him.

Therefore when after an indefinite stroll he at last found himself entering the Pulaski House and meeting face to face with Ellis, he was profoundly surprised at being accosted as follows in a low, determined tone:

"Will you at once cease your attentions to Miss Chenier?"



Straight out from the shoulder.

He looked into the young man's face, expecting to see that he was drunk; but such was not the case. He was sober, calm and evidently meant to be answered. A glance was enough. Julian did not hesitate.

"I shall do just as I please," he slowly and meaningly replied.

Quick as lightning Ellis slapped him in the face with the tip of his gloved hand, saying as he did so:

"You know what that means!"

What followed was something quite new in Savannah. Julian did not say a word, but squared himself like a prize fighter, tapped out lightly with his left hand, and followed with his right, letting go a resounding blow straight out from the shoulder against the side of his opponent's head. Ellis went whirling back, and falling heavily at full length upon the floor lay there almost senseless, while a number of men quickly gathered around. Julian still had the cigar in his mouth. He went to the clerk's counter and lighted it as coolly as though nothing had happened.

In a few moments Ellis had recovered himself, but his head was terribly shaken by the shock, and he found it difficult to stand. As soon as he could fix his fiery eyes on Julian he said:

"It was a coward's blow."

"You'll be a little careful hereafter about flipping your glove in my face, I suspect," calmly replied the northerner.

"I'll put a bullet in the place of my glove, if you are not a coward," rejoined Ellis.

"I shall defend myself at every point," said Julian, who thereupon turned about and went out of the room, and happening to remember that he had an engagement with Mr. Roosevelt, went to his office. He was not there. Mr. Hosea Jenkins, the factotum, said that a very important telegraphic dispatch from a relative had just been received, and that Mr. Roosevelt had made haste to go to his house to bear the sad news that his niece's mother was very sick and would probably die. She wished her daughter to come at once. Jenkins told all this with the dry precision and angularity of one whose mind contains nothing but numerals and tables of interest, market quotations and railroad time sheets. He sat at a high desk with a big ledger open before him. He had a pencil behind each ear and a pen in his hand.

"Is it Miss Chenier's mother who is ill?" demanded Julian.

"Yes, in the up-country somewhere," replied Jenkins, who, though a Yankee, was proud of his southern acquirements.

"Will the young lady go immediately?"

"Yes, sir; that is, Mr. Roosevelt telegraphed to his superintendent to get ready a special sleeper and engine."

"How long since he left here?"

"An hour, sir."

Julian turned from the office into the street and walked rapidly to the Roosevelt mansion. It seemed to him that everything was assuming an attitude hostile to his happiness and hurrying him on to some great calamity. But he must see Rosalie before she went away. The thought of parting from her was just now peculiarly bitter.

When he reached the house a servant informed him that Mrs. Roosevelt and her niece had already gone to the station. Mr. Roosevelt wished to send their special out behind the regular afternoon passenger train so as to run upon its time.

Julian felt a strange sinking of the heart. Altogether the day had been a trying one, and now to have Rosalie slip away from him, to be gone for an indefinite time, just when his fate was trembling in the balance of her decision, was too much. He drew his hand across his forehead, upon which cold beads of perspiration had gathered. He felt as though all his will power were deserting him. How strangely empty the great old house looked! There was her banjo leaning against the dark paneled wall.

He looked at his watch; it was ten minutes yet to train time; he could reach the station before she was gone if he could find a carriage. He hurried into the street again and looked in every direction. Then he went to the Pulaski House, hoping to find a 'bus or cab lingering there; but the fates were against him.

An hour later a colored boy brought him a note from Mr. Roosevelt, who wished to see him at the office. He went immediately and found there Mr. Largely also. A conference had been agreed upon with Sir Edmond Kane, and this meeting was for some precautionary consultation.

Julian's mind was more concerned with Rosalie than with business. His first inquiry of Mr. Roosevelt was about her. Had she gone alone? No, her aunt had accompanied her. They had a special

State of Minnesota, county of Polk—ss.

In Probate Court, Special Term, October 6th, 1891.

In the matter of the estate of Anton Suttner, deceased:

On reading and filing the petition of Fred Gesswein, agent for Mary Suttner administratrix, setting forth the amount of personal estate that has come into his hands, the disposition thereof, and how much remains undisposed of; the amount of debts outstanding against said deceased, as far as the same can be ascertained; the legacies unpaid, and a description of all the realestate, excepting the homestead, of which deceased died seized, and the condition and value of the respective portions or lots thereof; the persons interested in said estate with their residences: and praying that license be to him granted to sell all of the real estate described in said petition. And it appearing, by said petition that there is not sufficient personal estate in the hands of said agent for administratrix to pay said debts, the legacies or expenses of administration, and that it is necessary for the payment of such debts, legacies or expenses, to sell all of said realestate.

It is therefore ordered, that all persons interested in said estate, appear before this court on Monday the second day of November, 1891, at 10 o'clock a. m., at the probata office in Crookston in said county, then and there to show cause (if any there be) why license should not be granted to said administratrix to sell all of the realestate of said deceased as shall be necessary to pay such debts, legacies and expenses.

And it is further ordered, that this order shall be published once in each week for three successive weeks prior to said day of hearing, in the Red Lake Falls News, a weekly newspaper printed and published at Red Lake Falls in said county.

Dated at Crookston the 6th day of October, A. D. 1891. By the Court,
oc15-29 C. M. Benson, Judge of Probate,

Mortgage Sale.—Default having been made in the payment of the sum of fourteen hundred twenty-five and 33-100 dollars, ($1425.33) which is claimed to be due at the date of this notice upon a certain mortgage, duly executed and delivered by Thomas Perusse and Delima Perusse, his wife, to Josephine Majeau, bearing date the 2d day of June, A. D. 1886, and, with a power of sale therein contained, duly recorded in the office of the register of deeds in and for the county of Polk and State of Minnesota, on the 18th day June, A. D. 1886, at 9:30 o'clock a. m., in book T of mortgages, on page 224 therein, and no action or proceeding having been instituted, at law or otherwise, to recover the debt secured by said mortgage, or any part thereof, Now,

Therefore, notice is hereby given, that by virtue of the power of sale contained in said mortgage, and pursuant to the statute in such case made and provided, the said mortgage will be foreclosed by a sale of the premises described in and conveyed by said mortgage, viz:

The northwest quarter of section three in township one hundred and fifty north, of range forty three west in Polk county and state of Minnesota, with the hereditaments and appurtenances; which sale will be made by the sheriff of said Polk county, at the front door of the court-house, in the city of Crookston in said county and state, on the 14th day of November, A. D. 1891, at 10 o'clock a. m. of that day, at public vendue, to the highest bidder for cash, to pay said debt and interest, and the taxes, if any, on said premises, and fifty dollars, attorney's fees, as stipulated in and by said mortgage in case of foreclosure, and the disbursements allowed by law; subject to redemption at any time within one year from the day of sale, as provided by law.

There is a goodsized postoffice row, says the Thirteen Towns, brewing at McIntosh. Postmaster Johnson, who has just built a new store a few blocks down the street from its present location, threatens to move the office to his new store building—this is being opposed, on the ground that it will be too far from the business centre and will be too inconvenient for some of the business men. President Harrison will unquestionably be obliged to personally make a trip, accompanied by Postmaster General Wannamaker, to look over the situation and prevent bloodshed among the contending factions.

Robillard's thrashing outfit was at work on Tom Blair's farm Monday, just finishing up the job, with about fifty bushels more to thrash, when an accident occurred that, for the moment, made the crew think of last wills and testaments—the shaft of the fly wheel broke, sending a piece whizzing into the boiler, penetrating this and allowing steam and hot water to escape. It is needless to say the event was accompanied by deafening vereberatfons, and that the crew made distance between them and the engine with alacrity that could not have but presented ludicrous situations. E. Lizee, the engineer, turned off steam and remained at his post, and now has a laugh on the other boys—who claim, that anybody else in their place would have done the same.

The fact that bee culture in this section is almost nonexistent would indicate that the impression exists generally that it is an enterprise not suited to our conditions. We have labored under this delusion ourselves, to some extent. Edwart Huot, the enterprising Louisville farmer, is a successful apiarist, and has thus proven that this section's natural conditions are not opposed to the apiary business to any appreciative extent. Mr. Huot has been raising bees for five or six years, during which time he has constantly increased their number, having now 24 hives of honey producers and 34 which will begin their career of usefulness next year. This week he marketed 400 pounds of honey at 20 cents a pound. The bees are accommodated during the working season with a large and beautiful flower garden cultivated especially for them, and which often attracts the admiration of travelers who chance to pass that way—in winter the bees are unceremoniously relegated to the cellar, there to remain till spring. No attempt was made to winter them otherwise, and few would believe it possible. However, it is—as a swarm took it upon themselves to illustrate. They got away during the summer and took up their lodgment in a hollow elm tree, where they were found the following spring, in prime condition, and with a gratifying amount of honey. Mr. Huot has already sold a number of colonies and next year will strike up quite a business.

No choice was made for county superintendent at the last meeting of the board of county commissioners. The vote sood—2 for Carruth; 2 for Currie. The next meeting will be held in December. Carruth will act meanwhile.

The name of A. D. Wishard was proposed at the last meeting of the county commissioners for the office of county superintendent. It has been reported Mr. Wishard had an application before the board. This the gentleman wishes to deny as he is doing a lucrative realestate business and is well satisfied with the outlook and has a number of choice farms for sale—first come, first served.

The Roy school district at Ridge is in trouble and have the past week been seeking advice from the experienced members of our own turbulent board of education. It seems the clerk of that district, Eustache Payment, declines to sign the contract with the teacher, who has been teaching there now about a month. Frank Grenier, the treasurer, and N. Roy, the director, desire the services of the presiding preceptress and one of these had made a verbal contract with her as far back as July. The outcome will probably be favorable to her, as the majority of the board feel that way, but before that conclusion is reached there will doubtless be some tall wrangling.

A LARGE PYRAMID.

That Structure, Stands in Egypt on the Desert's Border.

It Is for a Sign to Mankind and Teaches a Lesson All Should Learn.

Dr. Talmage Tells of a Visit to the Pyramid and Reads the Lesson It Teaches.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.—The vast congregation at the Brooklyn Tabernacle Sunday morning was delighted by an exquisite rendering, by Prof. Henry Eyre Browne, on the new organ, of Denier's Second Sonata in G. Dr. Talmage's sermon was the first of a series he intends preaching on his Eastern tour, entitled, "From the Pyramids to the Acropolis, or What I saw in Egypt and Greece Confirmatory of the Scriptures." His text was Isaiah xix: 19, 20: "In that day shall there be an altar to the Lord in the midst of the land of Egypt and a pillar at the border thereof to the Lord. And it shall be for a sign and for a witness."

Isaiah no doubt here refers to the great pyramid at Gizeh, the chief pyramid in Egypt. The text speakes of a pillar in Egypt, and this is the greatest pillar ever lifted; and the text says it is to be at the border of the land; and the text says it shall be for a witness, and the object of this sermon is to tell what this pyramid witnesses. This sermon is the first of a course of sermons entitled, "From the Pyramids to the Acropolis, or What I Saw in Egypt and Greece Confirmatory to the Scriptures."

We had on a morning in December, 1889, landed in Africa. Amid the howling boatmen at Alexandria we hadcome ashore and taken the rai train for Cairo, Egypt, along the banks of the most thoroughly harnessed river of all the world—the river Nile. We had, at even-tide, entered the city of Cairo, the city where Christ dwelt while staying in Egypt during the Herodic persecution. It was our first night in Egypt. No destroying angel sweeping though as once, but all the stars were out, and the skies were filled with angels of beauty and angels of light, and the air was balmy as an American June. The next morning we were early awake and at the window, looking upon the palms trees in full glory of leafage, and upon gardens of fruit and flowers at the very season when our homes far away are canopied by bleak skies and the last leaf of the forest has gone down in the equinoctials.

But how can I describe the

for today we are to see what all the world has seen or wants to see—the Pyramids. We are mounted for an hour an a half's ride. We pass on amid bazaars stuffed with rugs and carpets, and curious fabrics of all sorts from Smyrna, from Algiers, from Persia, from Turkey, and through streets where we meet people of all colors and all garbs, carts loaded with gardens productions, priests in gowns, women in black veils, Bedouins in long and seemingly superflous apparel, Janissaries in jacket of embroidered gold—out and toward the great Pyramid, for though there are 69 pyramids still standing, the pyramid of Gizeh is the monarch of pyramids. We meet camels grunting under their load, and see buffaloes on either side, browsing in pasture fields.

The road we travel is for part of the way under clumps of acacia, and by long rows of sycamore and tamerisk, but after awhile it is a path of rock and sand, and we find we have reached the margin of the desert, the great Sahara desert, and we cry out to the dragoman as we see a huge pile of rock looming in sight, "Dragoman, what is that?" His answer is "The Pyramid," and then it seemed as if we were living a century every minute. Our thoughts and emotions were too rapid and intense for utterance, and we ride in silence until we come to the foot of the Pyramid spoken of in the text, the oldest structure in all the earth, 4,000 years old at least. Here it is. We stand under the shadow of the structure that shuts out all the earth and all the sky and we look up and strain our vision to appreciate the distant top and are overwhelmed while we cry

"THE PYRAMID! THE PYRAMID!"

I had started that morning with the determination of ascending the Pyramid. One of my chief objects in going to Egypt was not only to see the base of that granitic wonder, but to stand on the top of it. Yet the nearer I came to this eternity in stone the more my determination was shaken. Its altitude to me was simply appaling. A great height has always been to me a most disagreeable sensation. As we dismounted at the base of the Pyramid I said, "Others may go up it, but not I. I will satisfy myself with a view from the base. The ascent of it would be to me a foolhardy undertaking." But after I had given up all idea of ascending, I found my daughter was determined to go, and I could not let her go with strangers, and I changed my mind and we started with guides. It cannot be done without these helpers. Two or three times foolhardy men have attempted it alone, but their bodies came tumbling down unrecognizable and lifeless. Each person in our party had two or three guides or helpers. One of them unrolled his turban and tied it around my waist and he held the other end of the turban as a matter of safety. Many of the blocks of stone are four or five feet high and beyond any ordinary human stride unless assisted. But, two Arabs to pull and two Arabs to push, I found myself rapidly ascending from height to height, and on to altitude terrific, and at last at the tip top we found ourselves on a level space of about 30 feet square. Through clearest atmosphere we looked off upon the desert, and

OFF UPON THE WINDING NILE,

and off upon the Sphynx with its features of everlasting stone, and yonder upon the minarets of Cario glittering in the sun, and yonder upon Memphis in ruins, and off upon the wreck of empires and the battle-fields of ages, a radius of view enough to fill the mind and shock the nerves and overwhelm one's entire being.

After looking around for a while, and a kodak had pictured the group, we decended. The descent was more trying than the ascent for climbing you need not see the depths beneath, but coming down it was impossible not to see the abysms below. But two Arabs ahead to help us down, and two Arabs to hold us back, we were lowered, hand below hand, until the ground was invitingly near, and amid the jargon of the Arabs we were safely landed. Then came one of the most wonderful feats of daring and agility. One of the Arabs solicited a dollar, saying he would run up and down the pyramids in seven minutes. We would rather have given him a dollar not to go, but this ascent and decent in seven minutes he was determined on and so by the watch in seven minutes he went to the top and was back again at the base. It was a bloodcurdling spectacle.

I said the dominant or the pyramid was gray but in certain lights it seems to shake off the gray of centuries and become a blond and the silver turns to the golden. It covers 13 acres of ground. What an antiquity! It was at least 2,000 years old.

WHEN THE BABY CHRIST

was carried within sight of it by his fugitive parents, Joseph and Mary. The storms of 40 centuries have drenched it, bombarded it, shadowed it, flashed upon it, but there it stands ready to take another 40 centuries of atmospheric attack if the world should continue to exist. The oldest buildings of the earth are juniors to this great senior of the centuries. Herodotus says that for ten years preparations were being made for the building of this pyramid. It has 82,111,000 cubic feet of masonry. One hundred thousand workman at one time toiled in its erection. To bring the stone from the quarries a causeway 60 feet wide was built. The top stones were lifted up by machinery such as the world knows nothing of today. It is 746 feet each side of the square base. The structure is 450 feet high, higher than the cathedrals of Cologne, Strasburg, Rouen, St. Peter's and St. Paul's. No surprise to me that it was put at the head of the seven wonders of the world. It has a subterraneous room of red granite called the "king's chamber," and another room called the "queen's chamber," and the probability is that there are other rooms yet unexplored. The evident design of the architect was to make these rooms as inaccessable as possible. After all the work of exploration and all the digging and blasting, if you would enter one of these subterraneous rooms you must go through a passage only three feet eleven inches high and less than four feet wide. A sarcophagus of red granite stands down under

THIS MOUNTAIN OF MASONRY.

The sarcophagus could not have been carried in after the pyramid was built. It must have been put there before the structure was reared. Probably in that sarcophagus once lay a wooden coffin containing a dead king, but time has destroyed the coffin and destroyed the last vestige of human remains.

Well, of what is this Cyclopean masonry a sign a and a witness. Among other things of the prolongation of human work compared with the brevity of human life. In all the four thousand years this pyramid has only lost 18 feet in width, one side of its square at the base changed only from 764 feet to 746 feet and the most of that 18 feet taken off by architects to furnish stone for building in the city of Cairo. The men who constructed the pyramid worked at it only a few years and then put down the trowel and the compass and the square and lowered the derrick which had lifted the ponderous weights; but 40 centuries has their work stood and it will be good

FOR 40 CENTURIES MORE.

All Egypt has been shaken by terrible earthquakes and cities have been prostrated or swallowed, but that pyramid has defied all volcanic paroxysms. It has looked upon some of the greatest battles ever fought since the world stood. Where are the men who constructed it? Their bodies gone to dust, and even the dust scattered. Even the sarcophagus in which the king's mummy may have slept is empty.

So men die, but their work lives on. We are all building pyramids not to last four thousand years, but forty thousand, forty million, forty trillion, forty quadrillion, forty quintillion. For a while we weild the trowel or pound with the hammer or measure with the yard stick or write with the pen, or experiment with the scientific battery, or plan with the brain, and for a while the foot walks and the eye sees, and the ear hears and the tongue speaks. All the good words or the bad words we speak are spread out into one layer for a pyramid. All the kind deeds or maleviolend deeds we do are spread out into another layer. All the Christian or unchristian example we set is spread out into another layer. All the indirect influence of our lives are spread out into another layer Then the time soon comes when we put down the implement of toil and pass away, but the pyramid stands. The 20th century will not rock it down, nor the 30th century nor the 100th century. The earthquake that rocks this world to pieces will not stop our influence for good or evil. You modestly say, "That is true in regard to the great workers for good or evil, and of gigantic genuises, Miltonian or Talleyrandian, but not of me, for I live and work on a small scale." My hearer, remember that those who built the pyramids

WERE COMMON WORKMEN,

Not one of them could lift one of those great stones. It took a dozen of them to lift one stone and others just wielded a trowel clicking in on the hard edge, or smoothing the mortar between the layers. One hundred thousand men toiled on those sublime elevations. So with the pyramids now rising, pyramids of evil or pyramids of good. The pyramids of drunkenness rising ever since the time when Noah got drunk on wine, although there was at his time a super-abundance of water. All the saloonists of the ages adding their layers of ale casks and wine pitchers and rum jugs until the pyramid overshadows the Great Sahara Desert of desolated homes, and broken hearts, and destroyed eternities. And as the pyramid still rises, layers of human skulls piled on top of human skulls and other mountains of human bones to whiten the peaks reaching unto the heavens, hundreds of thousands of people are building that pyramid. So with the pyramid of righteousness. Multitudes of hands are toiling on the steeps, hands infantile, hands octogenarian, masuline hands, female hands, strong hands, weak hands. Some clanging a trowel, some pulling a rope, some measuring the sides. Layers of psalm books on top of layers of sermons. Layers of prayers on top of layers of holy sacrifice. And hundreds of thousands coming down to sleep their last sleep, and other hundreds of thousands going up to take their places, and the pyramids will continue to rise until the millennial morning gilds the completed work, and the toilers on these heights shall take off their aprons and throw down their trowels, crying, "It is finished!"

Your business and mine is not to build a pyramid, but to be one of the hundreds of thousands who shall ring the trowel, or pull a rope or turn the crank of a derrick or cry "Yo heave!" while lifting another block to its elevation. Though it be seemingly a small work and a brief work, it is a work

THAT SHALL LAST FOREVER.

In the last day many a man and woman whose work has never been recognized on earth will come to a special honor. The Ecumenical Council, now in session at Washington, its delegates the honored representatives of fifty million Methodists in all parts of the earth, will at every session do honor to the memory of John Wesley, but I wonder if any of them will think to twist a garland for the memery of humble Peter Bohler, the Moravian, who brought John Wesley into the kingdom of God. I rejoice that all the housand who have been toiling on the pyramid of righteousness will at last be recognized and rewarded—the mother who brought her children to Christ, the Sabbath teacher who brought her class to the knowledge of the truth, the unpretending man who saved a soul. Then the trowel will be more honored than the scepter.

Further, carrying out the idea of my text, the pyramid is a sign and a witness that big tombstones are not the best way of keeping one's self affectionately remembered. This pyramid and the 69 other pyramids still standing were built for sepulchres, all this great pile of granite and limestone by which we stand today, to cover the memory of a dead king. It was the great Westminister Abbey of the ancients. Some say that Cheops was the king who built this pyramid, but it is uncertain. Who was Cheops, anyhow? All that we know about him could be told in a few sentences. The only thing certain is that he was bad and that he shut up the temples of worship and that he was hated so that the Egyptians were glad when he was dead are over people who amounted to nothing while they lived, while some of the worthiest men and women have not had above them a stone big enough to tell their name. Joshau, the greatest warrior the world ever saw, no monument; Moses, the greatest lawyer that ever lived, no monument; Paul, the greatest preacher that ever lived, no monument; Christ, the saviour of the world and the rapture of heaven, no monument. A pyramid over scoundrelly Cheops, but only a shingle with a lead pencil epitaph over a good man's grave. Some of the finest obituaries have been printed about the worst rascals. Today at Brussels there is a pyramid of flowers on the grave of Boulanger, the notorious libertine. Yet it is natural to want to be remembered.

I do not ask you to suppress this natural desire of being remembered after you are gone, but I only want you to put your memorials into a shape that shall never weaken or fade.

African Fetish Men.

Established in reputation, the efforts of the fetish man are next directed toward the acquirement of a demeanor calculated to impress his clients with a sense of awe; he aims at assuming an appearance at once grave and mysterious; he seldom speaks unless professionally, and then always in a gruff, husky tone. He cultivates a meditative look, says a writer to the Century, and seems as if he were the victim of great mental anxiety. At home he keeps himself very select and occupies his time principally among his charms. There is generally some sign of his calling just outside his hut, taking the form, as a rule, of an earthen vessel, out of the neck of which sprout long feathers—the pot being colored with red, white and yellow chalks and the orange-like tint derived from chewed betel nut, the expectoration of which substance is supposed to have a very pacifying influence upon the spiritual evildoer.

Sometimes the fetish man's gesticulations will be directed to a carved image or some exaggerated form of charm. Suspended from the rafters in the interior of his hut are little parcels of mystic character, smoked grimy by the constant fires these people maintain in their dwellings. And outside, over the door, the same mysterious character of ornamentation proclaims to all the occupant's pretentions to sorcery.

A CURIOUS CUSTOM.

Description of a Fair Held at the Festival of the Dead in Japan.

"At the Market of the Dead" is the title of a paper in the Atlantic by Lafcadio Hearn. He writes:

The curious narrow street is one long blaze of lights—lights of lantern signs, lights of torches and lamps illuminating unfamiliar rows of little stands and booths set out in the thoroughfare before all the shop-fronts on each side; making two far-converging lines of multi-colored fire. Between these moves a dense throng, filling the night with a clatter of getas that drowns even the tidelike murmuring of voices and the cries of the merchant. But how gentle the movement!—a pressure soft as a flowing of tepid water: there is no jostling, no rudeness; everybody, even the weakest and smallest, has a chance to see everything; and there are many things to see.

"Hasu-no-hana!—hasu-no-ha!" Here are the venders of lotos flowers for the tombs and the altars, of lotos leaves in which to wrap the food of the beloved ghosts. The leaves, folded into bundles, are heaped upon tiny tables; the lotos flowers, buds and blossoms intermingled, are fixed upright in immense bunches, supported by light frames of bamboo.

"Ogara!—Ogara-ya!" White sheaves of long peeled rods. These are hempsticks. The thinner ends can be broken up into hashi for the use of the ghosts; the rest must be consumed in the mukaebi. Rightly all these sticks should be made of pine; but pine is too scarce and dear for the poor folk of this district, so the ogara are substituted.

"Kawarake!—Kawarake-ya!" The dishes of the ghosts: small red shallow platters of unglazed earthenware; primeval pottery wrought after a fashion which now exists only for the dead—pottery shaped after a tradition elder than the religion of Buddha.

"Ya-vondoro-wa-irima-senka!" The lanterns—the "bon"-lanterns—which will light the returning feet of the ghosts. All are beautiful. Some are hexagonal, like the lanterns of the great shrines; and some have the form of stars; and some are like great luminous eggs. They are decorated with exquisite paintings of lotos flowers, and with fringes of paper streamers choicely colored.

High above the thronging and the clamor and the myriad fires of the merchants, the great Shingon temple at the end of the radiant street towers upon its hill against the starry night—weirdly, like a dream, strangely illuminated by rows of paper lanterns hung all along its curving eaves; and the flowing of the crowd bears me thither. Out of the broad entrance, over a dark gliding mass which I know to be heads and shoulders of crowding worshipers, beams a broad band of rich yellow light; and before reaching the lion-guarded steps I hear the continuous clanging of the temple gong, each clang the signal of an offering and a prayer. Doubtless a cataract of cash is pouring into the great alms-chest; for to-night is the Festival of Yakushi-Nyori, the Physician of Souls. Borne to the steps, at last I find myself able to halt a moment, despite the pressure of the throng, before the stand of a lantern-seller, selling the most beautiful lanterns that I have ever seen. Each is a gigantic lotos flower of paper, so perfectly made in every detail as to seem a great living blossom freshly plucked: the petals are crimson at their bases, paling to white at their tips; the calyx is a faultless mimicry of nature, and beneath it hangs a beautiful fringe of paper cuttings, colored with the colors of the flower, green below the calyx, white in the middle, crimson at the ends. In the heart of the blossom is set a microscopic oil-lamp of baked clay; and this being lighted, all the flower becomes luminous, diaphanous, a lotos of white and crimson fire. There is a slender gilded wooden hoop by which to hang it up; and the price is four cents!

A Physician's Tall Yarn.

On one occasion, when several physicians had met, the conversation ran to the extraordinray things which a human being might swallow and still live, says Youth's Companion.

The familiar stories about swallowing silver dollars, sets of false teeth and so on had been related, when Dr. Longbow began to speak:

"Two years ago," he said, "I was called in great haste to attend a carpenter in my town, though the message said that beyond doubt the man was already dead, for he had, while holding a large gimlet in his mouth at his work, suddenly swallowed the gimlet.

"But when I arrived at the man's house I found him 'very comfortable.' The gimlet, gentlemen, gave him no trouble to digest."

There was silence for a moment. Presently one of the doctors remarked:

"With you for a physician, Longbow, the man was lucky that it was only a gimlet that he undertook to swallow."

"What do you mean?"

"Why, if he tried to swallow one of your stories it would have choked him to death."

"All Sixes and Sevens."

"How are you coming on, Uncle Mose?"

"Poorly, poorly, thank God."

"What's the matter?"

"I has seben gals to support, boss. Hit costs a power of money to fill up seben moufs free times a day."

"Yes, but I heard one of your daughters was going to be married, so that will only leave six to support."

"Dat's whar you am foolin' yerself, boss. Dat ar gal am gwine ter marry one of dese culled politicians, so instead of habin only six to support, when she marries, I'll have eight moufs to feed, for mighty few ob dese politicianers, white or black, is wuff de powder hit would take to shoot 'em. No, boss, it will be eight instead ob six ter feed when dat gal marries, not countin' de natural consequence."—Texas Siftings.

WILLING TO PLEASE.

The Druggist Had All Kinds of Poison but He Only Sold Gum.

A weary-looking young woman came into a Second avenue drug store when I was waiting for the shower to pass over, says M. Quad in the N. Y. Evening World, and plaintively said to the druggist;

"I have had another quarrel with Mike, and I do not care to live any longer!"

"Yes, just so, just so," he replied as he briskly rubbed his hands together. "Anything I can do for you to-day?"

"I think I will take strychnine," she slowly replied as she cast her eyes along the shelves.

"Exactly, ma'am, finest strychnine in New York. I suppose you want about a dime's worth?"

"Would arsenic be better?" she asked, as he held the jar in his hands.

"No better, but fully as good, ma'am. I have a fine lot of arsenic on hand just now, and can warrant it full strength. Just make a ham sandwich and spread on about 15 cents' worth?"

"Mebbe," she drearily replied as he waited, "mebbe," Rough on Rats would be better."

"Just as you think, ma'am. Give you a selection from two dozen boxes, all fresh only yesterday. It's a little slower than the other poisons, but perhaps you won't mind that. Can be sprinkled on bread and butter or taken in milk. One box, ma'am?"

He took down a box and held it ready to dump, and she looked around the store, wiped a tear out of her left eye, and asked:

"How long does it take paris green to kill?"

"Not long ma'am—only a few hours. Many prefer it to any other poison, as they want to write a farewell letter after taking it. I can warrant my stock as perfectly fresh and pure. Should it fail to kill, come right back and your money will be refunded. My object is to satisfy customers. Half a pound, ma'am?"

She wiped her nose. Then she sighed. Then she fished up two pennies from her pocket, walked over to the chewing-gum machine, and dropped them in, and as she stuffed two sticks of gum into her mouth she turned and said:

"I guess I won't take any to-day, but if Mike comes in tell him I was here inquiring for poison."

"Certainly — certainly — with the greatest of pleasure. Nothing else today? Please call again!"

Licorice—Where It Comes From.

The British consul at Bussorah, in an interesting report on the growth of the licorice-plant on the banks of the Tigris and Euphrates, says that these great rivers in the part where the root is found flow through flat, treeless prairies of uncultivated and nearly uninhabited land. For three months of the year hot winds blow and the temperature reaches 104 degrees. For six months the climate is moderate and salubrious and for three months bleak and wintry, the thermometer going down to 30 degrees at night. The licorice plant is a small shrub, with light foliage, growing to about three feet high, where its root can reach the water. It grows without cultivation. No lands are leased for the purpose and no objection is made to its being cultivated. It is found in abundance from Ctesiphon, ten miles from Bagdad, down to Kut-ul-Anara, half way between Bussorah and Bagdad. It grows on red-earth soil and also on light, almost sandy, soil, where the wood is best, provided it has plenty of water and the ground is not more than fifty yards from the actual river or stream.

Only one firm works it in Bagdad, and it is well known that the business is a prosperous one. The wood, after being once dug up and cut, grows again better afterward. The time of collecting is, generally speaking, during the winter, but it is possible all the year round. The root when dug is full of water and must be allowed to dry, a process which takes the best part of a year, especially in hot weather. It is then sawed or cut into small pieces six inches to a foot long. The good and sound pieces are kept and the rotten ones are used for firewood. It is then shipped in native river boats to Bussorah, whence it is shipped in pressed bales to London, and again from there to America, where it is used largely in the manufacture of tobacco. The consul thinks the trade is capable of expansion. The demand in America is great and shipments are easily disposed of. After sorting there still remains some unless wood in the bales, perhaps 7 per cent. From figures supplied by the Bagdad firm engaged in the business it seems that the total net cost of a ton of licorice root laid down in London is about £4.

An Indian's Gratitude.

Col. Breeden, late Attorney-General of New Mexico, was once retained to defend a Mexican and a Navajo Indian charged with the murder of a soldier on a street in Santa Fe one night. Two Mexican women testified that they witnessed the murder and thought they could identify the prisoners as the persons who committed it. But other evidence favored the accused and the court and jury thought the women were mistaken. Some time after the acquittal the Navajo turned up, in the seventh heaven of intoxication, and sought out Breeden. In his expansive gratitude he told the attorney that, although moneyless, as usual, he wanted to perform some great service in part payment of the debt he owed him for securing his acquittal.

"Come to my house," said the attorney, "and try your hand on my garden."

"But," said the Navajo, "give me something harder than that to do—some great thing for a brave. Don't you want somebody killed? If you do I'll serve him as we did the soldier!"

"Did you kill the soldier?"

"Of course we did. I thought you knew that."

ARAB HUMOR.

no Specimens of Ancient and Some of Modern Times.

The old Arabs have scarcely had tice done them, says the Rev. A. S. aes in the Independent. They are ually associated with prowling douins and murderous Mamelukes. l their civilization is supposed to be far behind the century as in China. at the golden era of the caliphs oc- rred when Europe was buried in the rk ages; that Arab peers sang of e and war and melancholy long be- e Shakspeare; that Cordova had ved streets when London was a mud- le, and Arab art and science flour- ed centuries before the birth of the ephone and steam engine, that ental luxury reached a point of gnificence under the Mohammedan ers which has never been surpassed Paris, Vienna, and New York—these facts which need only to be known secure the Arab some recognition qualities other than those of war l the chase. In its range and variety poetry, philosophy, theology, science, nance, travel—Arabic literature af- ds an extensive field for the student offers peculiarly fascinating sub- for inquiry and research.

Now, it may seem a paradox to as- t that the Arabs were born humor- s, and caliph and sheik were capital outeurs, whose jests and stories have t yet lost their point. Yet such was case.

LIVING ON HIS NERVE.

Remarkable Fight Against Death of a California Desperado.

Dr. Tallafero, of San Rafael, used to tell a wonderful story of a San Quentin convict—a highwayman in for life, says the San Francisco Examiner. A lot of prisoners, under guard, were engaged in unloading a schooner at the wharf on San Quentin Point, and were ordered to warp the vessel around to another landing. They went aboard and shoved off.

Up on the hill the other guards mistook the maneuvre for an attempt on the part of the convicts to escape. As a consequence they trained their cannon on the schooner, and before the mistake was discovered bowled over about a score of prisoners with grapeshot.

Dr. Tallafero was called to attend the wounded men. This is how he told of his experience with the gritty highwayman:

"When I came to the fellow I pulled his blanket down, looked at his wound, put the blanket back and passed to the next patient. I gave him five minutes more of life. A grape shot had struck him just at the top of the right hip and passed clear through him, shattering both hip bones and tearing him frightfully. By the time I had made my rounds I'd forgotten all about him.

"Then a nurse stepped up, saying the highwayman wanted to speak to me. I wondered that the fellow was still alive, and went over to his couch. 'Will you not dress my wound?' he asked. 'Certainly,' said I, 'if you wish it: but you can't live more than a few minutes, and dressing the wound will only give you needless pain.'

"'Nonsense,' he returned, 'you can't kill me with one grape shot. I've been shot to death once or twice before. Look at my chest.' I looked. Sure enough, he had bullet wounds enough to have laid out a dozen men. Twice, in stopping stages, express messengers had filled him full of buckshot. 'I'm alive yet and have more lives than a cat,' he said, as I made ready to attend him.

"I rammed and pulled a silk handkerchief through him to clean the wound and fixed him as best I could, knowing he'd be dead in the morning. But I didn't know. When I called the next day he was very much alive. He was as cheery as a bridegroom after the ceremony. 'Never mind me, doctor,' he said, with a grin; 'you just fix up the other boys; I'll be all right in a few days.'

"Well, sir, I expected to find him a corpse every time I called, but he hung on, cheered the others with jokes and stories, and I'm hanged if I didn't begin to think a medical miracle was to be performed. A man who could have lived a week and keep his head and spirits with that kind of a hole through him might do most anything.

"On the seventh day after he was shot he sent for me. As I came to his bedside he raised himself on one elbow, looked up at me with the old daredevil expression on his face, and said:

"'It's no go, doctor; I can't keep it up any longer. Good-by, old fellow.'

"Then he fell back, stone dead. He'd lived a week on his grit."

ON IVY POISONING.

Practical Hints About Its Symptoms and Treatment—Don't Be Frightened.

A reader wants to know the best cure for ivy poisoning, especially for that extending over the greater part of the face, and likely to involve the eyes.

The best treatment for ivy poisoning is to wash the places affected as soon as the poisoning has been discovered, in strong soapsuds or saleratus water. Plenty of good, clear water will answer if these cannot be obtained. Of course, after the inflammation begins to show itself some remedies must be applied which will check and control the eruption and swelling. The common household remedy is witch hazel, which can be procured at any grocer's in small bottles. This is very good for ordinary cases, but it has a tendency to relieve the itching and smarting sensation more than to check the speed and growth of the inflammation.

Probably one of the best things is to procure some common black wash at a drug store and use it as a lotion twice a day for half an hour at a time, says the Yankee Blade. Between these times keep the poisoned surface covered with cold water dressings or ointments of some soft nature. Another good wash is a teaspoonful of sugar of lead in a pint of water, applied as a wash several times a day. Poison from ivy or sumach can be treated in this way, but it is well to state that neither one of these poisons is dangerous. It requires about three or four weeks for the attacks to run their full course, and then the poisoned parts begin to heal up of themselves. Remedies can simply alleviate the pain and sometimes partly check the inflammation, but they never entirely prevent and cure the poison at once. The eruptions seldom show themselves until a day or two after contact with the poisons, and after that there is no danger from coming in contact with another person.

Although the poisoning sometimes assumes the appearance of a very serious case, the result is never permanent. No scars or disfigurements ever mark the skin or flesh after the poison has disappeared. The poison is an acid which exists in all parts of the plants, but especially in the leaves. Though some persons are not affected by it at all, others are so sensitive to the acid that it is not necessary for them to come in contact with the vines to get poisoned.

The Schultzes.

As most people know, Schultz is a very common name among Germans. A striking illustration of that fact is found in the city directory of Berlin, which has nearly 200 pages of citizens bearing that name. And in certain departments of the city government there are numerous sub-departments, each having a different set of clerks to take care of special divisions of the Schultz family.

THE COURT RELENTED.

An American Who Crossed His Legs and Was Arrested for It.

The charges that are made against the Chilian government of despotism, etc., recall, says the Indianapolis News, a story told by Col. Thomas H. Nelson after his return from Chili, where he represented this government as minister under the administration of Abraham Lincoln. He said:

"On the day after my arrival at Santiago, the capital of Chili, I received a message from an American, then in jail at that place, who desired to see me as early as convenient. I called at once and found a man who looked not unlike Joe Jefferson when made up as Rip Van Winkle. He said his name was Story, that he was a son of the late Associate Justice Story of the Supreme court of the United States and author of the 'Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States,' as well as a brother of W. W. Story, the sculptor and poet. He said he had been in that place six months, which was by no means inviting, and all of his efforts to find out why he was incarcerated or to secure a hearing had been without avail. He desired my assistance. I called at once on the minister of foreign affairs and requested some information as to the cause of Mr. Story's imprisonment. The minister had never heard of the case, but said as I was to be 'presented' to-morrow he would inquire into the case, and, by the time I was installed as envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary he would take up the case with me. Imagine my surprise on the day following to learn that my countryman had been charged with 'contempt of court,' and that his 'contempt consisted of entering the Supreme court and seating himself within the bar, when he had crossed his legs and looked directly at the judges.' I said: 'There could have been no contempt intended. It is an American characteristic. When I entered the private room of President Lincoln to take my final leave previous to my departure for this city, my post of duty, I found the president in a chair tilted back, with the middle of his back on the edge of the seat of the chair and his legs tied, it seemed to me, in a double bow knot on the marble mantel. I assure you there has been a great mistake made by some one.

"The case was brought to the attention of the court, explanations were made, and apologies accepted. The chief justice of the court then entertained Mr. Story, who, by the way, was an able as well as a very accomplished gentleman. He lived and died in Santiago, having gone there for his health."

Courting Under Difficulties.

"Yes," said the young man, as he threw himself at the feet of the pretty school teacher. "I love you and would go to the world's end for you."

"You could not go to the world's end for me, George. The world, or the earth, as it is called, is round, like a ball, slightly flattened at the poles. One of the first lessons in elementary geography is devoted to the shape of the globe. You must have studied it when you were a boy."

"Of course I did, but——"

"And it is no longer a theory. Circumstances have established the fact."

"I know; but what I meant was that I would do anything to please you. Ah, Angelina, if you but knew the aching void——"

"There is no such thing as a void, George. Nature abhors a vacuum. But admitting that there could be such a thing, how could the void you speak of be a void if there was an ache in it?"

"I meant to say that my life would be lonely without you; that you are my daily thought and nightly dream. I would go anywhere to be with you. If you were in darkest Africa or at the north pole I would fly to you. I——"

"Fly! It will be another century before man can fly. Even when the laws of gravitation are successfully overcome there still remains, says a late scientific authority, the difficulty of maintaining a balance——"

"Well, at all events," exclaimed the youth, "I've a pretty fair balance in the bank and I want you to be my wife. There!"

"Well, George, since you put it in that light, I——"—Greensburg Sparks.

Beetles and a Snake.

A resident of Nyack, N. Y., contributes this bit of natural history to a contemporary: "I was crossing a field, when my attention was attracted by a snake rolling over and over. The snake was about three feet long and appeared to be propelled by some power I couldn't see. I knew it was dead from the way it moved, and on looking closer saw that two big beetles were supplying the motive power. They were behind the snake, and by burrowing under it at either end acted as rollers to send the snake ahead. I saw them move it over ten feet. I spent most of the day in watching. They propelled it twenty feet farther and then stopped. One of them went away and soon came back with at least 100 beetles. This little army set to work and actually dug a hole in the ground about five inches in diameter and half a foot deep. It took them half a day to do this, and just about dark they appeared to be satisfied with their task, and the whole army set about dumping his snakeship into the hole, which they did by coiling up its body so that it fitted into the space nicely. Then they covered it up and disappeared in the thicket."

Museum of Boots and Shoes.

One section of the historical collection at Dresden is literally a museum of boots and shoes, being, it is believed, unequaled in the world as a repository for the footwear of celebrities. Among the things of interest shown are a pair of shoes that were worn by Martin Luther at the diet of Worms, and the fancy toilet slippers of the great Maria Theresa.

THE WASTE OF THE HOUSEHOLD.

The Millions That Are Lost in This Country by Bad Cookery.

Mr. Edward Atkinson, if not exactly making two blades of grass grow where one grew before, like Dr. Johnson's typical benefactor, is trying hard to make $1 in food preparation do the work of $2, which would be a great deal better. He declares in a recent publication the cost of food material absorbs half of the income of nine tenths of our people; that the waste of food amounts to more than all the cloth made in our factories; and that we consume a pound of coal for every pound of food that is cooked for our breakfast and dinner tables. We cook in the United States, he says, at least $3,000,000,000 worth of meat, fish, grain and vegetables in a year, and of that sum we lose $1,000,000,000 by bad cookery.

Being a light eater, and subsisting on $1 a week for food alone, Mr. Atkinson prefers the oil or gas stove to the ponderous "range" or "cookstove," which he thinks an invention of Satan. He adds this calculation: "I gave a seven course dinner to my whist club and friends, including oranges and coffee, which cost 13 cents each for the food material. I gave a dinner of four courses, soup, fish, meat and vegetables, and mush with molasses for dessert to nine of the poorer students at Harvard who want to economize; there were also three others; each had a pound and a half of strong food and the cost of twelve was 61 cents. And yet the authorities made us pay $1 each for our commencement dinner of four courses a month ago!"

The miracle of the five loaves and two small fishes is not repeated yet by Mr. Atkinson, but he is making approaches towards it. He says, and no doubt very truly, that a laborer whose wife knows how to choose meat as well as to cook it, can live on $1 a week, and much better than the average man fares, though this would compel her to buy the poorer kinds of beef. But for $2 a week the laboring man can buy the best, always excepting canvass-back ducks and tenderloin beef; and that, in Boston, a hard-working man can live well for 20 cents a day, and a woman at light work for 13 3-4 cents. I have no doubt of this; for I know a family which lives better than most persons, so far as food goes, for $1.11 a week, cooking included. But this requires great care and intelligence in buying and preparing the food.—Boston Advertiser.

Childish Faith.

An example of childish faith, of a kind a dull age wears away, was seen the other day. A little boy was sitting in the yard of an old country homestead; on either side of him sat a huge dog, patient and loving. The sun shone down scorchingly on the trio, and its rays were uncomfortable. Shading his eyes with his curved hand the child looked skyward and said: "Put in that sun, please." The sun shone brightly, and the little fellow repeated softly, "Please put in that sun, man up in the sky, it hurts my head." Just then over the blazing orb there sailed a white summer cloud, then another, and the yellow blaze turned suddenly to a hazy, restful gray. Turning to the dogs the little boy, putting an arm around the neck of each, said: "Did you see the sun pulled in, Romeo and Chieftain? When you wants anything, if you is good and you asks God for it, he gives it to you. The sun hurt my head and I asked him to put it in, and don't you see how he did reach out and put it in for me?" The dogs looked wise, leaned their heads lovingly towards the diminutive little theologian, and, whatever might have been their belief, kept an inscrutable silence.—Providence Journal.

Society in Cincinnati and St. Louis.

A good story, like a motion to adjourn, is always in order, so I pause just here to tell one. It introduces the chap from St. Louis. The other day, as half a dozen Americans were sitting in the smoking-room of a Swiss hotel, one of them remarked, "I saw in a recent number of the Paris 'New York Herald' a letter from a man who wrote to inquire if the United States' celebrated Society of Cincinnati was still in existence. Do any of you gentlemen happen to know whether it's alive or not?" The chap from St. Louis puffed vigorously at his cigar for a few moments and then said: "Well, sir, I know Cincinnati pretty well, and while it contains a good many nice people (my wife has a cousin living there), it ain't got no society to speak of. No, sir, if you want to see real tip-top society in the West, you've got ter come to St. Louis. I've half a mind to write to the Herald and tell 'em that while Cincinnati may have somethin' which she flatters herself is society, a firemen's picnic, or an afternoon tea, the real genuine article, what you might call the Four Hundred, is run out West by St. Louis."—New York Tribune.

The Spirit Moved Her.

Antoinette Sterling, the well-known contralto who used to sing in oratorio here and in England, and who has lately joined the Quakers, created an unusual sensation at a meeting at Legtonstone. After the meeting had sat for a long time without the spirit moving anyone to speak, Mme. Sterling got up and sang. Singing is unheard of in Quakers' meetings, but she sang "Rest in the Lord" without interruption. Afterward one of the elders approached her and said: "Thee knowest, sister, that it is against the rules, but if the Lord telleth thee to sing thee must."

Earliest Connecticut Patent.

According to the Scientific American, the earliest Connecticut patent on record was granted in October, 1717, to Edward Hinman of Stratford for the exclusive right and liberty of making molasses from the stalks of Indian corn, in Fairfield county for ten years, which grant ended with the words: "Always provided the said Hinman can make as good molasses, and make it as cheap, as comes from the West Indies."

THE GERANIUM DID IT.

How a Dear Little Flower Saved a Woman's Life.

The father and brother of a dear little woman died of consumption, and she firmly believed she would soon follow them with the dread disease. She had a friend who believed the invalid had inherited her mother's stronger constitution, and if she could only be aroused, and the idea banished from her mind that she would soon die, she might be a well woman. Arguments were in vain, and as the friend was going away for years, she gave a geranium to the dear little woman, with the request that she would take care of it, and also, that she work out in the garden through the spring and summer two hours a day. "I might as well do it," said the invalid, "for I shall not live but a few weeks or months at the longest." Very feeble were her first attempts at gardening and she would often say on coming in," "I shall die now, anyway." But the next day found her out again. The geranium was cared for, and gradually other plants were added. She became very much interested in gardening and her mind was taken up reading the many good floral magazines and in caring for her flowers. In the winter a bay window was full of blooming plants. It is now three years since she began this new cure, and it has worked wonders. She is a healthy, happy woman now, and says that "women stay in the house too much, are afraid of their clothes, and the tight lacing makes a short breath, and then they say, 'we are not strong enough to work in a garden.'" Shut up the pill-boxes and throw away the bottles. Breathe the fresh air and take your medicine at the end of a light hoe handle, and see if you don't save doctors' bills.—Vick's Magazine.

Beware of Ointment for Catarrh that contains Mercury, as mercury will surely destroy the sense of smell and completly derange the whole system when entering it through the mucous surfaces. Such articles should never be used except on prescriptions from reputable physicians, as the damage they will do is ten fold to the good you can possibly derive from them. Hall's Catarrh Cure, manufactured by F. J. Cheney & Co., Toledo, O., contains no mercury, and is taken internally, and acts directly upon the blood and mucous surfaces of the system. In buying Hall's Catarrh Cure be sure you get the genuine. It is taken internally, and made in Toledo, Ohio, by F. J. Cheney & Co.

"German Syrup"

Martinsville, N.J., Methodist Parsonage. "My acquaintance with your remedy, Boschee's German Syrup, was made about fourteen years ago, when I contracted a Cold which resulted in a Hoarseness and a Cough which disabled me from filling my pulpit for a number of Sabbaths. After trying a Physician, without obtaining relief—I cannot say now what remedy he prescribed —I saw the advertisement of your remedy and obtained a bottle. I received such quick and permanent help from it that whenever we have had Throat or Bronchial troubles since in our family, Boschee's German Syrup has been our favorite remedy and always with favorable results. I have never hesitated to report my experience of its use to others when I have found them troubled in like manner." REV. W. H. HAGGARTY, of the Newark, New Jersey, M.E. Conference, April 25, '90.

Farm For Sale.

A No. 1 Improved Stock Farm of 365 Acres for Sale Cheap.

THE PORTLAND STOCK FARM.

Situated adjoining the village of Portland, on the C. M. & St. P. R. R., 4 miles east of Mason City, Cerro Gordo Co., Iowa. Farm fenced into 18 different fields and yards all hog tight and horse high. Farm buildings and all improvements are first class. Two large troughs soft spring water five rods from barn; farm also watered by Lime Creek and several springs. Twenty acres of timber surround buildings, also one thousand (1,000) rods of beautiful willow hedge on farm, 20 to 75 feet high, mostly bordering on the highways. Four large barns (hay capacity 200 tons) with five hundred (500) feet of basement walls. A large water-power roller mill and cheese and butter factory join farm. A large, modern, first class farm house, built in 1890.

Mason City, the county seat of Cerro Gordo county, and the Lexington of Iowa, is a beautiful little city of about five thousand (5,000) inhabitants. She has just completed one of the best mile tracks in the state, which, with the fair grounds, have been built at an expense of $20,000.

Price of farm, forty-five dollars ($45.00) per acre. For particulars and picture of farm and buildings, call on or address the owner at Portland, Cerro Gordo County, Iowa.

Good Roads.

The following is from the Crookston Times, and comment is unnecessary: Mr. E. J. Holmes, the well known St. Hilaire hardware dealer, was down Monday, having assisted Constable Williams to bring down Frank Rosini. He says they drove down and it tood them only about for hours to make the trip. The distance from St. Hilaire to Crookston is almost three times as far as from St. Hilaire to Red Lake Falls, yet Mr. Holmes says he would rather make the trip here than to the Falls on account of the difference in the roads. Nearly all the roads leading to Crookston are now in excellent condition, and as a consequence this city is getting trade tuat under different circumstances would no subject to other places. The e is nothing like good roads to draw trade to a place. To a city surrounded by a prosperous farming country as Crookston is, good wagon roads are fully as important a factor in its growth and prosperity as are its railroads. They benefit the farmer also and his benefit is a direct one and he feels it upon every trip. Let us continue to improve the roads. Although they are now good there is still room for improvement and the investment will pay big returns.

Sugar Beets in Minnesota.

ANOKA, Nov. 5.—John Hunter is one of the farmers who tried beet-raising last year from seeds furnished by Senator Washburn, and with such success that he has tried it again this year. He sent samples to the state experimental farm this week and received the following report from D. N. Harper, the professor in charge:

Solids in juice, parts per hundred	20.74
Sugar in juice, parts per hundred	15.50
Purity of juice, parts per hundred	64.90
Pounds sugar, per ton of beets	310

Last year his beets tested about 16 parts per 100, where this year the test shows 15.5, but this is accounted for by the season. The beets yield from 8 to 10 tons per acre, andinsugar [illegible] a re sold readily at $5.50 per ton. This makes it a very profitable crop for the farmers and leaves a good margin for the manufacturers. Each ton, according to this test, will yield 310 pounds of sugar, which would be somewhere in the neighborhood $12 at jobber's prices. Six and a half ought to pay for the cost of manufacture and leave a nice profit for the manufacturer. It has thus been convincingly proven that Minnesota can raise raw material which will equal, if not excel, that of any other region, and now steps should be taken to bring the matter before the proper parties and thus agitate the regnery question.

Consumption Cured.

An old physician, retird from practice having had placed in his hands by an East India missionary the formula of a simple vegetable remedy for the speedy and permanent cure of Consumption, Bronchitis, Catarrh, Asthma and all throat and Lung Affections, also a positive and radical cure for Nervous Debility and all Nervous Complaints, after having tested its wonderful curative powers in thousands of cases, has felt it his duty to make it known to his suffering fellows. Actuated by this motive and desire to relieve human suffering I will send, free of charge, to all who desire it, this recipe in German, French or English, with full directions for preparing and using. Sent by mail, by addressing with stamp, naming this paper. W. A. NOYES 820 Powers' Block, Rochester, N. Y.

His Curiosity Was Gratified.

A stranger stood alone in the street of a great city. His hat was napless his boots covered with the dust of travel. Around him on every side a hurrying throng pushed and jostled in mad haste. He turned to a friendly policeman and said: "Say: Where be all these people gwine"! The officer was dumfounded at such ignorance Where are they going? Why, to purchase tickets via the popular Wisconsin Central If you are going anywhere you want to go with the crowd and ride on the best track in the most comfortable cars and with the greatest ease you ever experienced". For tickets berths and further information apply to any ticket agent.

Lambert.

Fatalities among children have been great here this fall and many homes still wear sombre garbes as a result. We have this week, to report the death of the five-month old girl of Mr. and Mrs. Hince, also the little daughter Mr. and Mrs. Thos. Plante, whose death was preceded by intense suffering. The bereaved parents have the sympapthy of many friends.

Thrashing in the vicinity of Lambert has been greatly retarded here as in other portions of this state by the unauspicious weather. North of Lambert scarcdly any grain has been thrashed.

Collections, under such conditions, are necessarily slow, yet much better than would naturally be expected.

The new church building has its framework up and enclosed, making a good showing.

Washing Made Easy.

Place the wash boiler over the fire with enough water to cover the bottom. Put two tablespoonfuls of kerosone oil and one teacupful of soft soap, or one-fourth cake of hard soap cut up. When it boils stir and then put in sufficient water to cover the amount of clothes to be boiled. Sort the clothes and put the dirtiest in the bottom of the boiler and the cleanest on top. Let them boil well, then take out into a tub and cover with cold water then wring and hang out. In freezing weather they will need no rinsing, as the freezing will take out all suds; in the summer lay on the grass, and a good rain will take the suds out, and when dry they will be all right. The clothes will need no rubbing unless they are very much soiled. This way of washing saves time, strength and water. If it is not freezing weather or there is no grass to lay the clothes on and showers, they will need rinsing. Some may sneer at the idea of washing clothes without rinsing them, but try it once my dear friends—once will do the clothes no harm—and find out how much labor it will save.—Ex.

November Discoveries.

This is a somewhat remarkable month for discoveries beneficial to mankind, and the influence of which coninues widening for good.

November 21, 1302, the use and benefit of the ship's compass was discoverd, and as without it safe ocean navigation would have been impossible, it may be called the parent of geographical discoveries that have been made since that time.

Novemer 18, 1497, the Cape of Good Hope was discovered, and then was opened to European commerce a water way to the treasures of the East and West first done by the slow and often painful progress of the caravan.

Novemder 26, 1778, the Sandwich Islands were discovered, and this has been a boon to Pacific ocean navigators, as a coaling and provisioning station. It ought to belong to the United States, and may some day be annexed by Uncle Sam.

Thanksgiving Day, too, was discovered in New England during this month, some two hundred years ago, and the people of the Northwest have discovered that to make a quick, safe and pleasant journey home on Thanksgiving—or any other day—"The Burlington" is the route to take. Tickets and any information can be obtained from local agents, or by addressing W. J. C. Kenyon, Gen. Pass. Agent, C., B. & N. R. R., St. Paul, Minn.

Robert Barber, of Cooksport, Pa., claims Dr. Kang's New Discovery has done him more good than anything he ever used for Lung Trouble. Nothing like it. Try it. Free Trial Bottles at W. A. Schreiter's Drug Store. Large bottles, 50c. and $1.00.

The True Sitation.

We have received assurance from official sources that if the resident property owners came together or separately reduce their valuations on lots crossed by the right of way, work will again commence and be continued during the winter in the heavy cuts between the rivers. Now is the last chance for the citizens to put a permanent value upon their lots. Is there any one blind enough to baffle his own prospects? Are the citizens of this town going to close their eyes to a truth that contains in itself the enhancement of the values of their realestate? We have worked continuously for this project, which will unite our town, which will centralize it, which will bury dissension and division, this project upon which if you now turn your back, you may forever cease to hope. Some of the property owners have been reasonable and placed the valuation of their lots at a reasonable figure, others have grasped at a straw and find themselves in the whirlpool of miscalculation. How much better would it be for the citizens of this village, to pull together, and if there is any individual who could not well afford to go below the present price asked for right of way, let the other citizens and property owners contribute, that the project to benefit all will not be nipped in the bud. Let the people make a last endeavor to pull together—come down from false and exorbitant values: come down from the speculative to the business basis and no doubt they will be recognized by the company. The delegates who have been in St. Paul endeavoring to induce the company to continue work have met with little encouragement and without an effort on the part of the citizens to still reduce the cost of right of way, there is little hopes the Great Northern will build on the line as surveyed. They might run to the east or the west thus making another addition prosper to the detriment of the whole village. Such is possible and very probable.

ALONG THE NILE.

Dr. Talmage Gives a Description of the Banks of Egypt's River.

The Stream Presents the Same Appearance as In the Days of Pharaoh.

The Voice of the Ages Speaks From the Tombs of Ancient Cities.

BROOKLYN, N. Y. Dr. Talmage preached Sunday on "Sailing Up the Nile," the second sermon of the series, entitled "From the Pyramids to the Acropolis, or What I saw in Egypt and Greece, Confirmatory of the Scriptures." His text was Ezekiel xxix., 9: "The river is mine and I have made it."

Aha! This is the River Nile. A brown, or yellow, or silver cord on which are hung more jewels of thrilling interest than on any river that was ever twisted in the sunshine. It ripples through the Book of Ezekiel, and flashes in the Books of Dueteronomy, and Isaiah, and Zachariah, and Nahum, and on its banks stood the mighties of many ages. It was the crystal cradle of Moses, and on its banks, Mary, the refugee, carried the infant Jesus. To find the birth-place of this river was the fascination and defeat of expeditions without number. Not many years ago, Bayard Taylor, our great American traveler, wrote: "Since Columbus first looked upon San Salvador, the earth has but one emotion of triumph left for her bestowal, and that she reserves for him who shall first drink from the fountains of the White Nile under the snow fields of Kilimanjaro." But the discovery of the sources of the Nile by most people was considered an impossibility. The malarias, the wild beasts, the savages, the unclimable steeps, the vast distances, stopped all the expeditions for ages. An intelligent native said to Sir Samuel W. Baker and wife as they were on their way to accomplish that in which others had failed: "Give up the mad scheme of the Nile source. How would it be possible for a lady, young and delicate, to endure what would kill the strongest man? Give it up." But the work went on until Speke, and Grant, and Baker found the two lakes which are the source of what was called the White Nile, and baptized these two lakes with the names of Victoria and Albert. These two lakes, filled by great rainfalls and by accumulated snows from the mountains, pour their waters laden with agricultural wealth such as blesses no other river, on down over the cataracts, on between frowning mountains, on between cities living and cities dead, on for four thousand miles and through a continent. But the White Nile would do little for Egypt if this were all. It would keep its banks and Egypt

WOULD REMAIN A DESERT.

As we start where the Nile empties into the Mediterranean Sea we behold a wonderful fulfillment of prophecy. The Nile in very ancient times used to have seven mouths. As the great river approached the sea it entered the sea at seven different places. Isaiah prophesied: "The Lord shall utterly destroy the tongue of the Egyptian sea and shall smite it in seven streams." The fact is they are all destroyed but two and Herodotus said these two remaining are artificial. Up the Nile we shall go; part of the way by Egyptian rail train and then by boat, and we shall understand why the Bible gives such prominence to this river which is the longest river of all the earth with one exception. But before we board the train we must take a look at Alexandria. It was founded by Alexander the Great and was once the New York, the Paris, the London of the world. Temples, palaces, fountains, gardens, pallared and efflorescent with all architecural and Edenic grandeur and sweetness, Apollos, the eloquent, whom in New Testament timer some people tried to make a rival of Paul, lived there. Here Mark, the author of the second book of the New Testament, expired under Nero's anathema. From here the ship sailed that left Paul and the crew struggling in the breakers of Melita. Pompey's pillar is here, about one hundred feet high, its base surrounded by so much filth and squalor I was glad to escape into an air that was breathable. The tower was built in honor of Diocletian for sparing the rebellious citizens. After having declared that he would make the blood run to his horse's knees, and his horse fell with him into the blood and his knees reddened, the tyrant took it for granted that was a sign he should stop the massacre, and hence this commemorative pillar to his mercy. This is the city to which Omar came after building fourteen hundred mosques, and destroying four thousand temples and thirty-five thousand villages and castles, yet riding in on a camel with a sack of corn, a sack of figs and a wooden plate, all that he had kept for himself, and the diet to which he had limited himself for most of the time was on bread and water. Was there ever in any other man a commingling of elements so strange, so weird, so generous, so fanatical? In this city was the greatest female lecturer the world ever saw —Hypatia. But that she taught was obnoxious and so they dragged her throught the streets and scraped her flesh from her bones with sharp oyster shells and then burned the fragment of the massacred body. And here dwelt Cleopatra, pronounced to be the beauty of all time—although if her pictures are correct I have seen a thousand women in Brooklyn more attractive—and she was as bad as she was said to be handsome. Queen, conquerers, and spoke seven languages, although it would have been better for the world if she had not been able to speak any. Julius Cæsar conquered the world yet she conquered Julius Cæsar.

According to the lead pencil mark in my Bible it was Thanksgiving Day morning, Nov. 28, 1889, that with my family and friends we stepped aboard the steamer on the Nile. The Mohammedan had been sounded by the priests of that religion, the Muzzeins, from the 400 mosques of Cairo as the cry went out; "God is great. I bear witness that there is no God but God. I bear witness that Mohammed is the apostle of God. Come to prayers. Come to salvation. God is great. There is no other but God. Prayers are better than sleep." The sky and city and palm groves and river shipping were bathed in the light. It was not much of a craft that we boarded. It would not be hailed on any of our rivers with any rapture of admiration. It fortunately had but little speed, for twice it ran aground and the sailors jumped into the water and on their shoulders pushed her out. But what yacht of gayest sportsmen, what deck of swiftest ocean queen could give such a thrill of rapture as a sail on the Nile? The pyramids in sight, the remains of cities that are now only a name, the villages thronged with population. Both banks crowded with historical deeds of 40 or 60 centuries. Oh, what a Book the Bible is when read on the Nile!

As we slowly move up the magestic river I see on each bank the wheels, the pumps, the buckets for irrigation, and see a man with his foot on the treadle of a wheel that fetches up the water for a garden, and then for the first time I understand that passage in Dueteronomy which says of the Israelites after they had got back from Egypt. "The land whither thou goest in to possess it is not as the land of Egypt, from whence ye came out, where thou sowedst the seed, and waterist it with thy foot." Then I understood how the land could be watered with the foot.

While sailing on this river or stopping at one of the villages we see people on the banks who verify the Bible description, for they are now as they were in Bible times. Shoes are now taken off in reverence to sacred places. Children carried astride the mother's shoulder as in Hagar's time. Women with profusion of jewelry as when Rebecca was affianced. Lentils shelled into the pottage, as when Esau sold his birthright to get such a dish. The same habits of salyation as when Joseph and his brethern fell on each other's necks. Courts of law held under big trees as in olden times. People making brick without straw, compelled by circumstances to use stubble instead of straw. Flying over or standing on the banks as in Scripture days are flamingoes, ospreys, eagles, pelicans, herons, cuckoos and bullfinches. On all sides of the river sepulchres. Villages of sepulchres. Cities of sepulchres. Nations of sepulchres. And one is tempted to call it an empire of tombs. I never saw such a place as Egypt is for graves.

Here we disembark a little while for Memphis, off from the Nile to the right. Memphis founded by the first king of Egypt and for a long while the capital. A city of marble and gold. Home of the Pharoahs. City 19 miles in circumference. Vast colonades through which imposing procession marched. Here stood the temple of the Sun, itself in briliancy a sun shone on by anothe sun. Thebes in power over a thousand one hundred years, or nearly ten times as long as the United States have existed. Here is a recumbent statue 75 feet long. Bronzed gateways. A necropolis called "the haven of the blest." Here Joseph was prime minister. Here Pharaoh received Jacob. All possible splendors were built up into this royal city. Hosea, Ezekiel, Jeremiah and Isiah speak of it as something wonderful. Never did I visit a city with such exalted anticipations and never did my anticipations drop so flat. Not a pillar stands. Not a wall is unbroken. Not a fountain tosses in the sun. Even the ruins have been ruined and all that remains are chips of marble, small pieces of sculpture and

SPLINTERED HUMAN BONES.

Here and there a letter of some elaborate inscription, a toe or ear of a statue that once stood in niche of palace wall.

But back to the Nile and on and up till you reach Thebes, in Scripture called the city of No. Hundred-gated Thebes. A quadrangular city four miles from limit to limit. Four great temples, two of them Kurnac and Luxor, once mountains of exquisite sculpture and georgeous dreams solified in stone. Statue of Remeses II., 875 tons in weight and 75 feet high, but now fallen and scattered. Walls abloom with the battlefields of centuries. The surrounding hills of rock hollowed into sepulchres on the wall of which are chiselled in picture and hieroglyphics the confirmation of Bible Story in regard to the treatment of the Israelites in Egypt so that, as explorations go on with the work the walls of the these sepulchres become commentaries of the Bible, the Scriptures originally written upon parchment here cut into everlasting stone. Thebes mighty and dominant 500 years. Then she went down in fulfillment of Ezekiel's prophecy concerning the city of No, which was another name for Thebes; "I will execute judgement on No. I will cut off the multitudes of No." This city of Thebes and all the other dead cities of Egypt iterate and reiterate the veracity of the Scriptures, telling the same story that Moses and the prophets told. Have you noticed how God kept back these archaeologial confirmations of the Bible until our time, when the air is full of unbelief about the truthfulness of the dear old book? He waited until the printing press had been set up in its perfected shape, and the submarine cable was laid and the world was intelligent enough to appreciate the testimony and then he resurrected the dead cities of the earth, and commands them, saying: "Open your long sealed lips and speak! Memphis and Thebes! Is the Bible true?" "True!" responds Babylon. "Ruins of Palestine and Syria! Is the New Testament true?" "True!" respond the ruins all the way from Joppa to the Dead Sea, and from Jerusalem to Damascus. What a mercy that this testimony of the dead cities should come at a time when the Bible is especially assailed. And this work will go on until the veracity and will be as certain to all sensible men and women as that two and two make four, as that an isosceles triangle is one which has two of its sides equal, as that the diameter of a circle is a line drawn through the center and terminated by the circumference, as certain as any mathematical demonstration.

I notice the voice of those ancient cities is hoarse from the exposure of 40 centuries, and they accenuate slowly with for ages, but altogether those cities along the Nile intone these words: "Hear us for we are very old, and it is hard for us to speak. We were wise long before Anthens wrote her first lesson. We sailed our ships while yet navigation was unborn. These obelisks, these pyramids, these fallen pillars, these wreckled temples, these colossi of black granite, these wreckled sarcophagi under the brow of the hills, tell you of what I was in grandeur and of what I am coming down to be. We sinned and we fell. Our learning could not save us. See those half obliterated hieroglyphics on yonder wall. Our architecture could not save us. See the painted columns of Philæ, and the shattered temple of Esneh. Our heroes could not save us: Witness, Menes, Diodorus, Rameses, and Ptolemy. Our gods Ammon and Osiris could not save us: See their fallen temples all along the 4,000 miles of the Nile. Oh, ye modern cities get some other God; a God who can help, a God who can pardon, a God who can save. Called up as we are for a little while to give testimony, again the sands of the desert will bury us. Ashes to ashes, dust to dust!" And as these voices of porphyry and granite ceased, all the sarcophagi under the hills responded, "Ashes to ashes!" and the capital of a lofty column fell grinding itself to powder among the rocks, and responding, "Dust to Dust!"

LIPS THAT WERE PALSIED

National Floral Emblems.

The origin of England's floral emblem, the rose, that of the fleur-de-lis of France, and the shamrock of Ireland are all better known than

"That emblem grand of bonny Scotland,
The bold and burly thistle."

About the middle of the fifteenth century, on the eve of St. Giles's day, and within the walls of the old council-chamber of Edinburgh, a number of Scotch nobles and Highland gentlemen met in "solemn conclave to deliberate on the desirableness of placing the thistle upon their banners instead of the figure of St. Giles, which they had hitherto used." They are described as "brawny," big-bearded men, dressed in Highland costume, and, as was the fashion of the day, with swords and dirks.

Long before this the thistle had been the recognized badge of the house of Stuart; and this fact, in connection with an older one that warning was once given of a night attack in progress by the Danes on a Scotch camp by one of the enemy accidentally putting his foot on a thistle, which made him cry out, was probably the chief reason of its choice instead of the heather. At any rate, it was chosen at that council as Scotland's floral emblem.

Erelong America may also boast of her national flower, and

To the fleur-de-lis and shamrock,
The thistle and the rose,
Add the bright Yankee golden-rod,
The bravest flower that grows.

as emblematic of this rich free country; for it is not only a native of the soil, but grows in every State in the Union, and in one or more of them is in bloom the year round. Its meaning, according to the language of flowers, is "encouragement." — Harper's Young People.

Running Classes for Ogontz Girls.

A gentleman spending the night with a friend on the Chelton Hills arose early the other day to catch a train for New York. While driving to the station he passed the former place of Jay Cooke, now used as a school for young women, and looking at the grounds he saw fourteen young women running in Indian file up a driveway. Each young woman wore a loose bodice and short skirt of dark blue, black stockings, and low, flexible shoes. They held their heads up, their shoulders down and back, and kept their mouths closed. On they ran rapidly, following an instructor, who led the way along the winding road until they disappeared.

"Bless my soul!" exclaimed the astonished New Yorker. "Who and what are they?"

"That's the Ogontz running class," replied his host with a smile. "Almost any fine spring morning you can see these girls start out for a mile and a half spin. The teacher of gymnastics is always with them and sees that none overtaxes herself."

The running class was organized a year ago and is one of the features of Ogontz gymnastics.—Philadelphia Inquirer.

WHAT IS YOUR SON TO BE?

A Splendid Field Offered by the Growing Electric Business.

Two men were sitting face to face between the car tracks on Park Row the other day. It seemed to be a dangerous position, for they could not follow their work and at the same time keep their eyes on the rattling teams on either hand. They had to keep their elbows in, too, or the car would bump them. They were seated at a manhole, testing cables of wires which were in the subway beneath. Each had the end of a cable in hand, and a portable galvanometer—a square box about the size of a cigar box—in front of him.

But a few years ago, says the N. Y. Advertiser, the man engaged in connecting wires in this way touched the tip of each wire in turn to the tip of the tongue. If there was a current running through the wire he felt a little pricking and a sour taste. He did this the whole day through, and was none the worse for receiving so many slight electric shocks and tasting so much copper. It was a very primitive test, but a very good one, and old wire-testers still use it when in a hurry. But soon a galvanometer was made, which not only finds the current, but gives some idea of its strength. The rapid way in which invention has been piled upon invention in the electrical world is marvelous, and it seems surprising that a sufficient number of workmen of sufficient intelligence should be found in such a hurry to practically put these inventions into use. A question upon this very point was put to a well-known electrician who happened to saunter by the two men at work.

"It is only surprising in a measure," he said. "As a matter of fact, the business has grown much faster than the intelligence necessary to handle it, and many accidents are due to that fact. The electric light people at first had to rely very largely on the workmen engaged by the telegraph companies, and both had to draft in a large number of new men and train them to the work. Any man with a little knowledge of mechanics and the handling of tools soon makes a good lineman. There is no great skill required, except in care that the wire does not become abraded in handling, while the good wages paid for the work—$75 a month—are a great inducement. But the business has undoubtedly suffered in its rapid progress for the want of skilled men, and the market is by no means overstocked yet. Only the other day one of the New York companies had to send to the New England Cable Company to borrow men to make joints in city lines.

"Some of the underground work, too, has been badly done, but much of this has been quite as much due to keen competition and the proverbial economy of the unscientific stockholders. When it comes to buying wire, costing from $1,400 to $1,500 per mile, the stockholder has a lot to say about it, and cheap wire is too often a result. One of the electric light companies runs an alternating current, and it now begins to find, all over the country, that its wires are already becoming faulty. They can not stand the strain. One of the things absorbing the attention of electric men to-day is to find an insulator which will stand heavy alternating currents. So the trouble has been as much a matter of cheap material as unskilled labor.

"Have the workmen a union yet?"

"No, not yet. There is an association called 'The Society of Electric Engineers.'"

"And where do the engineers and executive men come from?"

"A good many of the heads of departments have their training at the various schools of technology, such as the Stevens Institute, Hoboken; Cornell University, the Massachusetts School of Technology at Worcester. Indeed, nearly all the universities have classes in electricity now, and they supply a good deal of the talent for the business.

"These young fellows from the schools of technology have started in the blacksmith's shops and worked right up, and the only thing about electrical matters they have no knowledge of is the business end of it. They easily find positions at from $60 to $100 a month at the start, and readily get more according to the ability they display.

"It is a great business for a man to get into, whether he is well educated or not. There is such an enormous field for the application of electric power outside of the electric light. See how fast the electric street-cars have grown throughout the country. Then there are the other almost innumerable applications of the force which will soon be in demand. No, sir, the skilled workman who goes into the electric business, of whatever grade he may be, need feel no fears of his labor market being overcrowded."

The Discontent of Man.

A rich man of Boston had one son. He led him about, he instructed him, he kept him as the apple of his eye. The son became of age last summer. The father has no other occupation save that of nursing his income, and as he is a man of sense and liberal views he told his son that he must not stand idle, yet left to him the choice of business or profession. At the same time he wrote privately to twenty-four friends and acquaintances, asking their advice in the matter. The twenty-four were prominent, each in his own calling. And each replied in turn, complaining of his own business and advising the father to seek elsewhere for the future prosperity of the young man. The law was crowded, journalism brought but little money, banking was an uncertain prop, and so on throughout the catalogue. The father is still undecided; the boy is idle. And all because no one of the twenty-four is contented with his lot, while he admires the fortunes of other men.—Boston Post.

BOOBIES, SURE ENOUGH.

Birds That Catch Fish for the Negroes of the African Coast.

A number of interested spectators were standing at the seawall at North Beach watching a party of youngsters who were angling for mud porgies through holes bored in the planking. The fish bit quite eagerly, and several were pulled through the holes and laid on the wharves within a few minutes. Finally one of the bystanders, turning to a companion, said:

"The queerest way to catch fish that I ever saw was on the African coast, where the natives do it by proxy."

"How is that?" inquired the other.

"Didn't you ever hear of it; no? Well, I'll tell you. One day we were cruising just above St. Paul de Loando, and were quite close in shore, when the mate, who had the glass screwed up to his eye as he looked toward the land, said, 'I wonder what those natives are doing in those canoes, sir?' pointing to a couple of canoes two or three miles off our lee bow.

I took the glass, and, after looking a moment, I said, they were either fishing or catching boobies. 'Making boobies do their fishing, I guess,' chimed in the second mate. I had heard about the natives making use of these stupid birds for such a purpose, but had never seen it, so I motioned to the man at the wheel to keep the ship away, and we ran down toward the canoes. It was a lovely day, and we had just a light breeze from the northward and westward, with a sea as smooth as a mill pond. We were soon near enough to see the fishing operation distinctly.

"There was a flock of boobies hovering around and once in a while one of them would dart into the water and seize a fish. As soon as he got to the surface he would give it a toss in the air and as it came down catch it in his open bill. It would then be part way down his throat with half the body and the tail sticking out. If left alone the bird would gradually work it down his gullet and dispose of it, but this he was not permitted to do. The moment he appeared on the top of the water one of the canoes was alongside and the poor booby was seized and dragged on board. One of the negroes would catch him by the throat and, applying pressure, compel him to disgorge his prey, when he was at once released with the request—I presume that is what it was, for the rascals jabbered something very fast—that he go and catch another.

"The natives had been quite successful, as each of the canoes were well loaded with fish. After a while I made signs to them to come alongside, and I bought about a bushel of the fish, giving them a ten-pound chunk of salt horse in return. The fish were mostly sea bass, weighing four or five pounds apiece, with a few pike among them."—San Francisco Examiner.

How I Became a Gymnast.

The writer of this sketch was a little fellow himself not many years ago. He remembers how he used to look with complete and absolute disgust on his bony little arms and thin pipe-stem legs. He used to look at the big muscles of one or two companions with hopeless envy. In fact, it got so bad that this particular little fellow determined to get strong, if it took years to do it.

The first thing was to get a bar. I selected a nice spot between two grape arbors, planted deep in the ground two heavy oak uprights, and fastened firmly across the top, with mortised ends, a long heavy pitchfork handle, which was purchased at a village store at a cost, I believe, of twenty cents. When the turning-pole was finished, the next thing was to learn to do something. The first thing I learned was to hang on the pole. This may not seem like a very exciting trick, but the fact is my muscles were so weak that it took all my strength to hang there.

By this time other boys became interested. They began to put bars in their own yards, and the little fellow had to superintend the operation and give instructions. The oak uprights should be about three by three, and planted with side braces. The postholes should be at least three feet deep, and after the posts were set filled in with stones and earth firmly stamped down. The bar must be just a couple of inches out of one's reach standing under it flat-footed. Half a dozen private bars resulted in a gymnasium in an empty stable loft. The little fellow watched his arms and legs with great concern, and could not for the life of him see that they were getting any bigger.—Harper's Young People.

Something New in Pets.

A well-known author is responsible for this amazing tale: "I was going down-town not long since when my attention was riveted by a figure on the opposite side of the car. It was a negro girl of about 13. She was as black as coal, and gorgeously arrayed in a bright red cashmere, short enough to display red stockings and scarlet kid slippers. On her short, crisp curls rested a fez, and a scarf of the same torrid hue was folded about her shoulders. Her big eyes rolled about in delight, both at her costume and the notice she invited. Just beside her sat a quietly dressed and refined-looking young lady. I was so curious about this pretty and fancifully attired young negress that at last I leaned over and spoke to her. You can fancy my astonishment when the young lady leaned over and said to me:

"'She can't speak English yet. She is from Cuba.'

"I suppose my surprise must have shown itself on my face for the young woman went on with the utmost sangfroid: 'My sister had a magnificent Gordon setter presented her, and papa said I might have anything I wanted for a pet, so I took this,' with a careless nod toward the negro girl. I pursued my journey in a state of collapse over this departure in pets."—N. Y. World.

INTER-PLANET SIGNALLING.

A Woman's Prize of $20 000 for the Person Who Shall Find a Way.

A Paris cablegram says a French nun has bequeathed 100,000 francs to the Academy of Science, to be given as a prize to any one who shall discover any means of communicating with another world, planet or star. The planet Mars was suggested in the will as the most convenient heavenly body on which to make the experiment.

"This proposition may seem ridiculous, but it is not any more so than the idea of James Lick, the founder of the Lick conservatory," said a man well versed in starry lore.

"The Lick bequest to build the great telescope was intended to establish the fact whether or not the moon is inhabited. Now let us consider the difficulties in the way of this project. The distance of the earth from the moon may be stated in round numbers as 240,000 miles. It is a fact recognized in military science that a man can be fairly distinguished by the eye at a mile's distance. In making calculations regarding vision it is the general rule to estimate that to be seen a mile away an object must be half a yard wide. The best telescope has a magnifying power of 2,000 diameters. Half the distance to the moon is 120,000 miles. Divide this by 2,000, the magnifying power of the glass, and you get sixty yards as the minimum size of an object in the moon discernible by the aid of the telescope from the earth. So an object must be 180 feet wide or thick to be more than an appreciable dot. I have made the most liberal allowances in this computation. The atmospheric conditions must be perfect, and 2,000 is an unusually high power to be used by an astronomer.

"If an object must be 180 feet thick to be seen from the earth on the moon, it would be best to make it 200 feet. To give the inhabitants of the moon an idea that there are intelligent beings on earth, it would be necessary to place, say three objects in view of the moon's people—let them remain for a time arranged at the angles of a triangle. Then they might be changed so as to be in a straight line. The man in the moon seeing these phenomena, might conclude that there was intelligent beings on earth and arrange for some corresponding signal to the inhabitants of earth. But, while this seems possible, it shows how preposterous would be the attempt to determine with the most powerful telescope now in use whether the moon is inhabited.

"Now, as to the proposed communication with Mars. At the time when Mars and the earth are nearest to each other—are in perihelion—the distance is in round numbers 35,000,000 of miles. Take half this distance and you have 17,500,000 as the number of yards that represents the size of an object in Mars that could be seen that distance with the naked eye. Divide this by 2,000, the power of the biggest telescope, and you have 8,750, the size of the smallest object plainly discernible at such a distance with the telescope. This is equal to about five miles.

"An object in the planet Mars could be perceived as a little larger than a dot with the aid of the largest refractor and under the most favorable, in fact absolutely perfect, atmospheric and other conditions, if it was five miles in diameter. This is when the planet is nearest to us. On the other hand, at that time nothing on the earth could be discerned from Mars, because the earth would be in a straight line between the two and in the blaze of the sun's light. An inhabitant of that planet would have to wait until the earth was in some other part of its orbit, and the distance between the earth and Mars would then be many times as great as in perihelion So it would be necessary to construct an object to be discernable on the earth from Mars, say twenty miles in diameter. It might be circular in form. Other structures not inferior in size would have to be erected at distances of not less than twenty miles from each other. Then, after these had remained for a time, their relative positions might be changed. These bodies, moreover, to be clearly distinguished from the surface of Mars must be intensely luminous. A solid ball of electric light twenty miles in diameter would suffice.

"Considering the size of the structures required, their distance from each other, and the necessity of changing their places to indicate to a man in Mars that these luminous structures were the result of intelligent action are not natural phenomena. The sum bequeathed by the French nun may be seen to be greatly inadequate. The Academy of Sciences at Paris may for this reason refuse to accept the bequest. If the sum were offered for a prize essay on some plan for accomplishing communication with a sister sphere it might be more reasonable.

"In all the above computations it must not be forgotten that all the conditions must be favorable, the atmosphere as well as the relative positions of the earth and Mars. Such conditions happen only in a great while."—Chicago Tribune.

How the Divided Skirts Are Made.

Do you want to know, asks the Free Press, how the divided skirts of the famous dancers are fashioned? Make your skirt of light crisp silk, some pretty color—scarlet, if you like, or bright blue. Let it come half way between knee and ankle. Just a pair of scant bloomers, either ballooning or holding by elastic about the leg. On each leg sew a ruffle half way above the knee, a full ruffle, or better still, a knife plaiting that falls to where the bloomers end. If you want to be very particular you can put another ruffle under this just about the knee of each leg and falling to the edge of the bloomers. Then a new skirt this same length and of the same material to the end of the bloomers. No matter what happens, no flash of white can suggest exposure. The white articles of wear are safe under the blooms. No matter how high a reach the step up is the ruffles on the lifted leg fall in a mass about the leg and down to the other leg, looking as if one's skirts clung kindly.

JAPANESE GIRLS.

All of Them are Taught to Play on a Guitar or Harp.

In Japan there are two things which are taught to all the little girls, says Our Little Men and Women, one is how to place a flower or a branch of leaves in a vase, and the other is how to play on a guitar. If you go into a Japanese home you hear a tinkle from almost every room. You get used to this soft, light beat of music as you do to the gurgle of a brook or the drip of a fountain. There seems to be no Japanese house without its flower vase, its picture on the wall, and its guitar. The Japanese have four kinds of guitar or harp.

The Samasin is the common kind. It has a long, black neck, its square body is covered with a tight catskin, and it has three strings or wires; the player strikes these wires with a curious little piece of ivory or she picks them with her fingers. Then there is the big Koto with its thirteen strings, and there is a tiny lute with four strings, and there is a very fine sort of a harp brought from China and called a girken. The girken has three sets of wires, and if Miss Chrysanthemum is an accomplished musician she makes gay music on her Chinese harp. With the rosy finger-tips of her small brown hands she can bring forth from the wires all the sounds of the great Japanese hunt, which takes place each year the 3d of November.

On one set of the wires she can call like a hunter to his hounds, and from another set at the same time you hear the hounds bark and bay. She will give you from that little harp the most entertaining noise—the cries of the Japanese wild animals, and the note of the swamp and water birds.

The Japanese are so fond of music that they scarcely take a meal without the harp or guitar. The table music is either furnished by a daughter of the family or a "singing girl" hired from the outside, of whom there is a large class in Japan.

"The "singing girl" will come in on her little wooden clogs, bringing her guitar, and with the jeweled hairpin stuck in her glossy black hair and her gay sash tied in big bows at the back she looks exactly as you see her on Japanese fans. While the family eat rice, and beans, and raw fish she will sing them a song of a flowering cherry-tree or a red peony, or chant them a ballad of the golden dragon, sounding the guitar all the while. I am sorry to say she sings "through her nose" and in a very high key. Sometimes a small drum is used, and now and then the singer accents her song with a dull, soft boom, boom, boom.

The Japanese girls have very beautiful names—names which mean "Little Purple," "Little Butterfly," "Silver Bird," "White Brightness," "Brightener of the Flower," "Pearl Harp," and many other lovely things.

Keeping House in London.

An American taking a house in London will learn at the outside that she will have to keep more servants in the old country than in the new, says John Gilmer Speed, in The Ladies' Home Journal. These servants are trained, and one who is willing to engage to do many things is usually willing to take such a position because she is incompetent in everything. A small family there would keep a cook, a chambermaid and a waitress. The washing would be put out and a charwoman would be called in once a week to help with a general cleaning and clearing up. A very good cook can be had for one hundred dollars a year, a chambermaid for sixty dollars, and a smart waitress for eighty dollars. The charwoman will be paid two shillings, or fifty cents, a day, and given her beer and food. The washing for such a family will cost from three to four dollars a week. In America such a family would have two women—one a cook, who would also wash and iron, and another as chambermaid and waitress. The servants we have here do more, but they do it more roughly and are totally deficient in that silent subservience which makes the trained English domestic perform the usual household duties with automatic celerity. Generally, you have to have a greater number of servants there than here, but wages are less and the feeding costs less. There the servants do not expect to eat just what is provided for the family. Not at all. When the marketing is done special things are bought for the servants, and they have a table of their own, the meals being served at a different hour, and the quality of food very much less in cost. They eat very little meat, most of it salt; the cheapest kind of fish, and then they have potatoes and greens and puddings with treacle. And they are provided with beer, unless in engaging servants it is stipulated that the engagement is "without beer."

Abridged History of a Courtship.

Met him.

Met him again—in love with him.

Met him again—but no longer in love with him, but he is in love with me because I am so beautiful.

Met him again—he is still more in love with me, not only because I am beautiful, but because I am also good. Sorry for him.

Again I met him—he is colder than he was. Think he has forgotton my beauty and my goodness. I, however, am inclined to think that I am in love with him after all. How lucky he is, and how angry mamma will be!

Mamma proved to be strangely pleased. Makes me angry, for I know she is not a good judge of a young girl's heart.

Flirted with him outrageously to make mamma mad—didn't succeed.

Engaged to him—glad.

Married to him—sorry.—Cincinnati Commercial Gazette.

Fond of His Frau.

The German Emperor is said to be extremely fond of his big, kind-hearted blonde frau, and is reported as saying: "I could wish no better to the men of my nation than that the girls would follow the example of their Empress in devoting their lives as she does to the cultivation of the three K's—die kirche, die kinder, and die kuche" (the church, the children, and the cuisine).

A TRANQUIL MAN.

But He Wanted to Have a Quiet Seance with a Friend.

There was a man walking up and down in front of the Pavonia ferry-house at the foot of Chambers street the other day with a parcel in his hand, says M. Quad in the New York World, and after a time a policeman who thought he might need information asked him what was wanted.

"Look-a-here!" replied the man, as he opened the parcel and displayed a pair of suspenders which had once been of a sky-blue color, but which had faded out to the hue of a November cornhusk.

"Well?" queried the officer.

"Bought 'em of a young feller right here four weeks ago!" hoarsely whispered the victim. "Give him a quarter. He warranted 'em not to run or fade. I want to see that young man for about two minits."

"They have faded, I see," observed the officer.

"I should remark! I hadn't loaded three loads of hay before they commenced to run, and the red went clear through to my hide! The young feller lied—deliberately lied, and I want a brief interview with him!"

"I would advise you to be tranquil," said the officer, as he returned the suspenders.

"Oh, I am a tranquil man. I'm the tranquilist man in our county. I'm jest as cool and calm as an ox in a fence-corner. I don't even breathe hard. Haven't seen the young feller around here to-day, hev ye?"

"No. If you raise a row you will be run in."

"I shan't raise no row. I'll jest go along up the street and look for him. If I find him there won't be no scrimmage. I'll jest walk up to him and sorter reach out, and whoever finds the body will find these suspenders reposin' on his cold and dewy bosom. I'm a tranquil man and very tender-hearted, but I'll jest walk along up the street and look for that liar. He won't holler and he won't suffer long—not more'n fifteen seconds!"

He headed off up the river, looking very stern and solemn as he dodged among the vehicles, but as no report was made of any one being found dead he probably missed the suspender man.

Henry Grady.

The fame of Henry Grady flashed across the firmament like a comet. For two years it shone resplendent, then suddenly became a memory.

After his death the incidents of his career were remorselessly chronicled and commented upon, but the true story of his start in life has never been told.

His rapid rise on the Atlanta Constitution from the humble rank of private to the office of commander-in-chief has been accounted for in many ways, says the N. Y. Tribune. For years it was commonly believed in his native state that Victor Newcomb set him on his feet. The then head of the Louisville and Nashville system, so the story went, took a fancy to the bright careless, effervescent young man and said to him:

"Henry, do you want to make a little money?"

Grady confessed that he had harbored such a desire once upon a time but that Bohemianism of the newspaper business had robbed him of it.

"Well, we'll see if we can't revive the feeling," Mr. Newcomb said. "Go and invest all you have in Louisville & Nashville. Say nothing to a soul and be patient."

"I can't buy much stock with 75 cents, but on your tip I'll put it up," said Grady, his black eyes twinkling with merriment.

"Never mind about the 75 cents. Your credit is good. How much would you like to invest?"

"Ten thousand as a flyer."

Mr. Newcomb stifled, as well as he could, his amazement at the young man's audacity.

"When will you be in Louisville again?" he asked.

"In ten days."

"Come to see me then and we'll talk over it."

In ten days Grady turned up and Mr. Newcomb hand him a check for $7,000.

"These are your profits," he said. "Better invest them at once."

Henry did invest; he reinvested, and kept on investing till his benefactor pulled up short.

"Now go home and lock up your money in some good enterprise. You have won $20,000. Never gamble again."

Returning to Atlanta, Henry bought a fifth interest in the Constitution and was made managing editor. His profits were handsome and his fame grew apace.

Not Outdone by the Queen.

During my last visit to England I heard some amusing stories, some of them worthy of chronicling.

While I was there the queen visited Derby to open a charitable institution, and, to show her appreciation of courtesies, knighted the mayor, a very worthy man, who was married to a very worthy woman. The royal party, in the course of events, registered in the visitors' book at the town hall, a clean page being headed:

"Victoria."

Beneath this the wife of Henry of Battenberg, who was in the party, signed herself:

"Beatrice."

The mayoress, whose turn it was to sign next, caused a gasp of astonishment from the royal party. She nervously nibbled her pen for a moment, deeply lost in thought, and then wrote:

"Jane."

She evidently thought that a mayor's wife, and especially one whose husband had just been hit a clip on the shoulder with a sword, was entitled to due deference, and perhaps not so far removed from the privileges of the great ones who had signed before her.—Illustrated American.

WHAT SHE WOULD DO.

If She Were a Young Girl and Had Her Daily Bread to Earn.

"What would you do," asked one woman of another who is wise in the ways of bread-winning, "if you were a young girl and had your living to earn?"

"I don't know," was the answer, "but I can tell you some things I wouldn't do.

"I wouldn't teach unless the 'call' was almost deafening, because then I should be carrying my little napkinful of talents to a market sadly overcrowded.

"I wouldn't study stenography or typewriting unless I knew or had opportunity to learn two or three modern languages besides English, and unless I was to start uncommonly well educated; for unless I could fit myself for one of the few extremely good places I should find the other places had little money in them.

"I wouldn't go behind a counter unless I needed $4 or $5 or $6 a week so urgently that I couldn't do without it while I was learning a better business. If I did turn saleswoman I wouldn't do my work languidly or negligently, for I hope I should know that the question of who should continue always to earn $6 and who should earn $40 would be conditioned by that other question, out of 800 or 1,000 who were the half dozen that had most intelligence and capacity for application.

"Whatever I did I wouldn't do it with an eye to that and nothing more. I would remember a certain assistant bookkeeper who does her work with perfect exactitude and punctuality, yet sees every lad who enters the office promoted above her head, because the lads open their eyes in many directions and are ready and eager the moment there is a chance for advance, while every afternoon the bookkeeper rolls up all thoughts of her work with the methodical rolling of her soap and white apron. She isn't really interested in it, and once her sense of duty is satisfied she goes home to embroider things for charity fairs and absorb herself otherwise. She is absolutely faithful, and, like a majority of women workers, absolutely without intelligent ambition.

"Whatever I did, I would remember the saying of one of Brooklyn's big dry goods men: 'Of all my employes the best women are the very best, but the average woman ranks far below the average man.'

"If I wanted to succeed with any success beyond a bare living I would try hard not to be an average woman."

What Becomes of Old Shoes.

Few persons know what becomes of old shoes or the method in which they are utilized. A few of the more respectable cast-off shoes are sometimes repaired and sold again for a nominal price to some person who is fastidious, but as a general rule they are put to other uses.

In France, children's are cut from the larger pieces which are obtained by ripping up old boots, but in this country, as well as abroad, the practice now is to convert the scraps into a leather pulp, which may be so treated as to produce a substitute for the real article—cheap and comparatively worthless, of course.

Of late the manufacture of an artificial leather wall-covering, selling under a high-sounding name makes a market for all the worn-out boots and shoes of the American people, so that in its revised form the discarded footwear of the most wretched of earth's children may look down for years upon the scenes of splendor such as the forlorn wearer saw not even in dreams.

There are other uses as well, including the manufacture of buttons, combs, knife-handles and other articles which are interesting, but of which the public know little. Carriage-makers, book-binders and picture-frame makers consume this artificial leather to a certain extent for their cheaper grades of work.—Youth's Companion.

A Useful Little Creature.

People are not always well-informed concerning the usefulness of the toad. If he does not carry a jewel in his head he is quite as valuable as if he did, for he does a work no gardener can do in clearing a garden of its insect pests.

Many a gardener builds this little gnome small dwellings of bits of stone in the nooks of his flowerbeds, and cherishes him as a valuable assistant, destroying larvæ, worms and flies as he does with neatness and dispatch.

A very remote cousin of the garden toad, commonly called the tree-toad, is really a frog; he looks so much like the old bark and lichens on the trees he frequents that it is difficult to discover him.

The song with which he helps the cricket break the peace of summer nights is apt to be a true prophecy of rain.

A Severe Test.

The Pennsylvania Railroad company has begun to put cast-iron car-wheels to a very severe test. For each fifty wheels which have been shipped or are ready to ship, it is provided that one wheel shall be taken at random by the railroad company's inspector—either at the railroad company's shops or at the wheel manufacturer's, as the case may be—and subjected to the following test: The wheel shall be placed flange downward on an anvil block weighing 1,700 pounds, set on rubble masonry two feet deep, and having three supports, not more than five inches wide, for the wheel to rest upon. It shall be struck centrally on the hub by a weight of 140 pounds falling from a height of twelve feet. Should the wheel break in two or more pieces after eight blows or less, the fifty wheels represented by it shall be rejected; if, however, the wheel stands eight blows without breaking in two or more pieces, the fifty wheels will be accepted. The wheel for test to be furnished by the manufacturer in addition to the fifty wheels ordered.

The manufacture of false teeth for horses is a new industry opened in Paris with a capital of 2,000,000 francs.

Her Money and Her Cats.

Newark has a most eccentric woman. She is old, and is said to be just as rich as she is eccentric. Her sole companions are cats, and the house fairly swarms with them. She holds an idea that her feline pets are more honest than men, and, therefore, she rolls up the money she receives from rents in small packages and gives them to the cats, saying: "Here, pussy, put this away for me." Her home is littered with money, it is said. Under the carpets, in the corners, in rat-holes, and in every conceivable place bills and coins are stuffed.

This is the picture of the young King of Servia, aged 16, and to become a full-blown King in two years: "He is a lanky, pale-faced lad, who wears his hair cropped close in French fashion. He has his mother's large, fine eyes, but his forehead is low, and he does not seem to be possessed of the same shrewdness and quickness of his father. He has had a miserable education, and leads a solitary life, without having a single playmate."

Beware of Ointment for Catarrh that contains Mercury,

as mercury will surely destroy the sense of smell and completly derange the whole system when entering it through the mucous surfaces. Such articles should never be used except on prescriptions from reputable physicians, as the damage they will do is ten fold to the good you can possibly derive from them. Hall's Catarrh Cure, manufactured by F. J. Cheney & Co., Toledo, O., contains no mercury, and is taken internally, and acts directly upon the blood and mucous surfaces of the system. "August Flower"

"I inherit some tendency to Dyspepsia from my mother. I suffered two years in this way; consulted a number of doctors. They did me no good. I then used your August Flower and it was just two days when I felt great relief. I soon got so that I could sleep and eat, and I felt that I was well. That was three years ago, and I am still first-class. I am never without a bottle, and if I feel constipated the least particle a dose or two of August Flower does the work. The beauty of the medicine is, that you can stop the use of it without any bad effects on the system. While I was sick I felt everything it seemed to me a man could feel. I was of all men most miserable. I can say, in conclusion, that I believe August Flower will cure anyone of indigestion, if taken with judgment. A. M. HIS SECOND CAMPAIGN car. Mr. Roosevelt had sent his oldest and most careful railroad man along with them.

"But what is this rumor we hear of a fight between you and Ellis?" said Largely, who was highly gratified to learn that the mountaineer had at last "run against a solid header," as he termed it.

Julian explained without explaining. He did not hint of any connection Miss Chenier's name had had with the affair.

"I regret all this very much," said Mr. Roosevelt; "Ellis comes of a fighting family; he will challenge you immediately."

"If he does, I'll have him arrested forthwith," replied Julian.

Mr. Roosevelt straightened himself stiffly in his chair, and gazed at the young man in utter disgust.

"That would be just the thing," exclaimed Largely. "It might have a good educating effect on the young men hereabout if we'd make an example of one by landing him safely in the state prison. What do you say, Mr. Roosevelt?"

"I should think a gentleman would get dry comfort out of such a proceeding."

"Yes, ha! ha! ha!—yes, you're right," chuckled Largely; "a gentleman would feel queer in the penitentiary."

Julian was not so obtuse to Mr. Roosevelt's meaning. He saw at once that Rosalie's uncle held strictly to the old code of honor, and it flashed across his mind that she, too, might do the same.

Next morning he rose from his bed resolved not to fight a duel, let the result be as it might. What cared he for southern sentiment and custom! He owed his allegiance to Chicago and not to Savannah.

When he went into the breakfast room he found that Mr. Roosevelt had already gone down town, having been sent for by some one, the servant said. Later it transpired that it was Mr. Largely's message, and the business in hand was to consult over a sudden turn in railroad affairs. In short, Ellis had sold out all his interests to Sir Edmond Kane and party. This simplified matters, so that an adjustment of the Florida muddle proved quite easy. Mr. Roosevelt and Julian were greatly surprised. As for Mr. Largely, he swore roundly that Ellis had some devilish scheme in his head, and said that he felt sure no good ever could come of the fellow.

To the further surprise of everybody Ellis disappeared as soon as his sale was consummated. Julian received no challenge. Days slipped by. A letter came from Mrs. Roosevelt announcing the death and burial of Mrs. Chenier. Julian's mission was ended and Mr. Largely was ready to return to Chicago.

"I haven't seen enough of the south yet," said Julian, by way of excuse for not accompanying his employer on his northward flight; "and I think I shall linger awhile in Atlanta and some of the smaller mountain towns. I want to revisit two or three of the battle grounds over which I charged when a soldier lad."

"All right," replied the millionaire, "you know your business best, but I individually have got about all the south I shall ever care for."

Edgar Julian's departure from Savannah was abrupt. He read the following personal item in The News and left on the next train:

"Mr. Francis W. Ellis, who recently sold his railroad interests in Florida to the English and Dutch combination, is spending a few weeks among the mountains of the up-country near Calhoun. It will be remembered that he formerly had a large distillery in that region, the capture of which by government emissaries caused great excitement at the time. It was rumored that a duel was pending between Mr. Ellis and a noted Chicago lawyer, but the matter has most probably been amicably arranged. Mr. Ellis' career here has been short but brilliant. It is understood that he netted about $500,000 on his roads. Pretty good for a little less than three months' work!"

In Augusta he tarried for a day, but why he did so he could not have told. That he was dreaming of finally making his way to Rosalie he admitted, and at the same time he did not purpose to see her at all. Love is always thus paradoxical. He knew that Ellis was up in north Georgia on no other errand than to be near her, and he could not bear to think of any one, much less Ellis, seeing her oftener than he; still he wasted a day in Augusta, idly strolling in the streets and thinking of what an unpardonable thing it would be for him to follow Miss Chenier to her home under such circumstances.

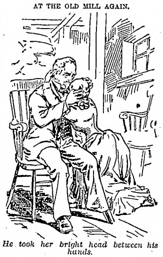
When he got to Atlanta he stopped and loitered. He found much to interest him, many reminders of some hard fighting and exciting adventures. He went and stood by the blackened foundation stones of what had once been a spacious mansion on an airy hill overlooking a broad plantation in a fertile valley. He remembered how that house came to be burned. It was situated about two hundred yards from the Western and Atlantic railroad, and from its high hill commanded the track. Some rebel sharpshooters had taken refuge in it, and were galling the company to which Julian belonged. The order was given to charge the hill and fire the house. Julian, then a mere boy, was the first to reach the spot. He attacked the door with the butt of his gun and broke it in. As he did so a young woman fired at him with a pistol, the ball lightly creasing the top of his head. He was enraged and rushed at his fair assailant with leveled bayonet. She retreated and escaped, but not before he had slightly wounded her in the arm. He then lighted a match and set fire to the house.

Now, as he stood gazing at the ruins, pathetically clothed in their wild brambles and half buried in ashy debris, he fancied he could hear the thunder of the fight rolling away toward Snake Creek Gap. Below him lay the valley, scarcely less a fenceless ruin than when the army had left it charred and smoking after the battle.

He turned away, wondering what had become of the unfortunate family, and especially the young woman.

CHAPTER XVIII.

AT THE OLD MILL AGAIN.



He took her bright head between his hands.

It would serve no good purpose to describe the sad scenes at the old Chenier mill, where, amid her humble surroundings, Rosalie's sweet and patient mother died and was buried. Mrs. Roosevelt and her niece arrived just in time to receive the last words of the poor, wornout woman. Just here the veil must fall; we shall let a week pass after the burial before we again approach the thread of our story.

Some days passed before Rosalie thought of showing her father the cross Julian had given her. She told him all the young man had said about Provence and Chateau Chenier. He listened and became absorbed, holding the dull gold cross in his palm the while and gazing fondly into the sweet, saddened eyes of his child.

"Since I lost my limb," he said in a melancholy tone, "and have been able to do nothing else, I have longed a great deal to go to Provence and see for myself."

"And shall we not go some day, papa?" she inquired, slipping her arm gently around his neck.

He shook his head.

"Too poor, dear, too poor," he replied; "it requires a great deal of money to travel."

"But, papa, I am not poor; Uncle Roosevelt has settled an income of ten thousand a year on me in my own right!

Colonel Chenier raised his head and gazed incredulously into her face.

"You will let me take you, won't you, papa?" she sweetly continued; "Aunt Marguerite says she will go with us."

He could not answer, but he took her bright head between his hands and kissed her forehead. Her voice was more than music in his ears.

"It is a long, long way, and I am growing old," he presently said, "but I do not regard this as my country now; I should like to live the rest of my days in Provence, and at last mingle my dust with that of our ancestors."

"We will go," said Rosalie earnestly; "we will go and see, even if we do not stay. Mr. Julian says he sat upon an old wall at Chateau Chenier and saw the moon come up from behind a hill crowned with olive trees, just as it is described in the troubadour song you taught me. Mr. Julian likes all my little French songs."

Colonel Chenier looked calmly askance at his daughter and wondered if this Mr. Julian had touched her fancy.

"I wish I could see your young northerner," he presently said; "you have made me like him; is he agreeable, is he handsome, Rosalie?"

"I hardly know how to answer. He is kind, affable, polite, and I am sure he is honorable; but one can hardly call him handsome. He's a great big, strong man, broad faced, deep eyed, and, I think, remarkably intellectual."

"How does he feel toward southern people? Is he a radical?"

"He seems liberal; he and Uncle Roosevelt have grown to be great friends, and you know Uncle Roosevelt cannot tolerate a radical."

"Has he made a very warm friend of you, Rosalie?"

"Oh, yes, I like him very much," she said with emphasis.

Colonel Chenier smiled; it was the first since the death at the mill.

"You haven't let him convert you to the Yankee idea, have you?" he inquired, toying with the cross and throwing a little touch of pleasantry into his voice.

"No, not that, but I like the north, especially the west, and the people up there are delightful; they are so much in earnest, so thrifty and industrious, and yet so kind and hospitable. You'd like Chicago, papa, I know you would. And you'd like Mr. Julian too."

"Perhaps, perhaps," said Colonel Chenier in a tone of doubt. "I suppose he is too young to have been in the Yankee army."

"Oh, he was with Sherman all the way to the sea," said Rosalie quickly; "he remembers all the little towns along the line of march; he spoke of Dalton, Resaca, Calhoun, Kingston and Marietta; he was a mere boy, but he went through it all."

A grim, ashen shadow settled over Colonel Chenier's face as her words called up the memory of his burned up home and devastated plantation, his slaves set free and his fortune dissipated by the breath of that army of Sherman's.

"He was one of the house burners and woman insulters then, perhaps."

"Oh, no, he wouldn't do that; he's too much of a gentleman to ever have been guilty of such acts," she quickly exclaimed, her voice full of earnest faith in the young man's innocence. "He is a proud, honorable, conscientious man, not at all what I imagined a northerner to be; but, in fact, papa, all the northern people are different from what we have thought them; they are really charming."

"They were infernal vandals when they marched with Sherman, no matter what they are now. Why, don't you know that one of them stabbed Adelaide in the arm with his bayonet?"

"But he was some low down hanger on of the army, or some foreigner; he could not have been a representative northern man."

"They were all of a piece; they stole with one hand and carried the torch in the other."

Colonel Chenier was growing excited, and Rosalie artfully changed the subject of conversation. She inwardly resented having Edgar Julian classed with the common vulgar soldiery; but she did not wish to antagonize her father. She felt sure that if Julian could have a talk with Colonel Chenier he would win a way to his respect. A sense of high duty urged her to present the young man to her father in the most favorable light, but innate maidenly modesty forbade any unseemly haste to become his defender. It would be hard to discover, and still harder to define, the amount of advantage that the simple fact of Julian's visit to Provence gave him in holding his own in the estimation of both Rosalie and Colonel Chenier; for, although the latter had never seen him, the cross and his words at second hand from Rosalie were sufficient to win for the young man a favorable prejudice in the old soldier's heart. Still there was a great barrier to pass.

Colonel Chenier nursed an implacable hatred against the men whose acts—in his judgment altogether unjustified by honorable rules of warfare—had rendered him almost a pauper. The chains of poverty galled him and kept alive his enmity toward those whom he habitually called Sherman's thieves. Against them he charged up all the toil, privation and humiliation of these "reconstruction years" through which he had dragged himself, a pitiable and despondent cripple. He often said that the man who shot him in battle, if he could ever find him, should have his forgiveness and friendship; but the vandals who burned his house and assaulted his daughter, who devastated his plantation and enticed away his slaves, should never be recognized as fellow citizens by him.

Aunt Marguerite used Colonel Chenier's season of grief to the effect of bringing about a reconciliation between her husband and her brother. A trouble had arisen between Mr. Roosevelt and Colonel Chenier over political differences many years before. One had been a Whig, the other a Democrat. They had come near fighting over the question of the war with Mexico. Mr. Roosevelt ardently opposed the war policy, Colonel Chenier just as fervidly defended it. The result was a rupture. So, after the great calamities of personal disfigurement and hopeless poverty had fallen upon Wilton Chenier with the ending of the rebellion, Mrs. Roosevelt had labored hard to bring these two foolish enemies together. Her husband finally consented, but Colonel Chenier, her brother, rejected the offer. Now she had adroitly approached the latter under cover of his domestic bereavement, and had reached his heart while it was laid bare. Rosalie added her sweet influence, and the stern man was conquered. In short, the result was, as we have said, a reconciliation.

It was finally agreed that the remains of Mrs. Chenier should be taken up and removed to Savannah and entombed in lovely old Bonaventure, and that the Chenier family should go to Roosevelt Place, to remain there until preparations could be made for the trip to the ancestral estate in Provence. Aunt Marguerite cleverly humored this Provencal dream, whose fanciful threads had, as she discovered, wound themselves about the imaginations of father and daughter; she made everything serve her turn, in fact. Rosalie had become her idol, and to keep that idol near her was her constant solicitude and study.

CHAPTER XIX.

AT THE SPRING AGAIN.

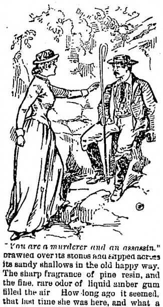
It was not until after the agreement had been made touching the abandonment of the old mill that Rosalie began to feel something of her early love for the "pocket" returning in the shape of a tender, sorrowful regret. She clambered along the little stony path up to the spring where she used to sit and read the romances and poems of knightly days, but she took no book with her now. It was with greater difficulty than formerly that she surmounted the big fragments of mountain stone and the mossy logs that lay in the way. Her neatly fitting black dress was not fashioned for such freedom of action, and then, perhaps, these months of indoor life and physical restriction may have eliminated some of her birdlike lightness of movement.

As she passed along under the green pines and red brown oaks, she heard a cardinal grosbeak whistling shrilly, and some bluejays were chattering in the thickets along the hillside. The brook drawled over its stones and tripped across its sandy shallows in the old happy way. The sharp fragrance of pine resin, and the fine, rare odor of liquid amber gum filled the air How long ago it seemed, that last time she was here, and what a world lay between then and now! She sat down upon the gray lichen blotched stone where Ellis had found her when he was skulking from the detectives. It was with a thrill that she recollected that meeting and what followed. The tall, handsome, brigandish fellow, armed to the teeth, firm, alert, ready for a daring deed, had left a strong romantic impression in her memory Along with the thought came its fragrance, so to speak, and she felt a warm blush of maidenly shame tingle in her cheeks at recalling the mysterious pleasure his loverlike actions had given her. She rested her elbows upon her lap and hid her face in her hands. Just then a rich, manly voice called her name.

"Rosalie!"

It was so infinitely tender and musical! She looked up quickly, with a great throbbing in her breast.

"Rosalie!" it repeated.



"You are a murderer and an assassin."

Ellis stood before her, dressed in a short gray jacket and loose trousers, a brown sportsman's shirt and a dark scarlet scarf; heavy top boots and a wide brimmed brown felt hat completed his attire, and he bore in his right hand a long alpenstock, while on his left shoulder was slung a light rifle. There were those same fearless dark eyes, the olive cheeks, the drooping mustache, the firm, well set chin, the tall, strong form. She almost leaped to her feet, then, feeling a sudden weakness, sat down again.

"I dreamed last night that you would be here in this dear place, and I have come all the way over the mountain to find you, Rosalie." He said this slowly, with a vibration in his voice that gave it great power

"You ought not to have come," she responded, meeting his eyes with an appeal in her own, and throwing something almost of bitterness into her tone. "I did not want to see you."

"Why, Rosalie, why?" he exclaimed, sitting down near her; "what have I done to offend you? Tell me, tell me!" He was already growing pale.

She sprang to her feet; she was weak no longer; her eyes flashed.

"You are a murderer, an assassin, and dare to ask me what you have done! You who struck Colonel Talbot in the night when he was"——

"Miss Chenier!" he exclaimed, rising as he spoke; "what do you mean?"

She looked steadily, passionately at him. Presently she cried:

"What do I mean? You know what I meant Oh, Mr. Ellis, I could not have believed you so wicked!"

"Rosalie—Miss Chenier—you are certainly laboring under some horrible mistake," he said in a hoarse voice and involuntarily taking a step nearer her. "Won't you explain"——

"Let your own conscience, if you have one"——

"Miss Chenier, I do not know what you mean," he emphatically cried.

"What I mean! what I mean!" she disdainfully repeated.

"Can it be possible," he slowly exclaimed, as if something were dawning upon his mind, "can it be possible that you are accusing me of doing that injury to Colonel Talbot from which he is still so mysteriously suffering? Good heavens, Rosalie!" he added after a few moments of silence, during which time his eyes did not turn from her face, "how terribly you have wronged me!"

Her eyes searched his with an intensity that nothing but utter innocence could have withstood, it would seem, and yet he bore it without a waver. He seemed, indeed, to meet it and welcome it.

"I would rather you would kill me outright than for you to insinuate so awful a charge," he went on, feeling the poverty of language in so great a need. His voice began to gather up its fascinating sweetness and flexibility.

Rosalie faltered and trembled as the magnetism of his unshrinking face overcame her. She sank down upon the stone pale and exhausted.

He was by her side in a moment.

"Explain this mystery, this dark, horrible insult to my honor, Rosalie!" he pleaded, speaking rapidly and passionately. "How could you get such a thing into your mind? Who has been poisoning you against me by hinting such a malicious and unfounded accusation?"

"No one," she said; "no one. I—I thought you did it."

"But how could you?" he impatiently cried; "I can't see how you could. Whatever started you to thinking it?"

"We saw you following us," she said scarcely above a whisper.

"Following you—us—whom do you mean?"

"Colonel Talbot and me," she answered.

"Following you where?"

"That night in the street—the night he was hurt."

"Following you the night he was hurt! Why, Rosalie, I was not in Savannah that night. I did not know he was hurt till I saw the papers next day.

ECHOES OF THE RAPIDS

An Autumn Cameo.

Southward
Birds are flying:
Summer's dead.
Overhead
The leaves are dying,
Changed from living green to Russet red.

Westward
Red light's glowing,
Through the trees;
And the breeze,
O'er spice fields blowing,
Brings a breath of tropics
Over seas.

Northward,
Cloud banks flying
Cold and gray.
All the day
The winds are sighing
For the sunny southland
Far away.

Eastward,
Wings of morning
Freshness bear;
And the air,
The valleys scorning,
Brings from dewy hilltops
Odors rare.

The display of fall and winter ladies' jackets and cloaks at Joseph Smith & Co.'s is the best in the city.

Be sure and attend the lecture by Mr. T. R. Stewart next Tuesday evening at 8 o'clock. Burgdorf building on Broadway.

Mrs. M. Bray, who had been confined to bed for several weeks, is again about, having almost regained her usual good health.

Misses Maria Lavik, Clara Simenson and Zona Wilkins have secured schools at Fosston, St. Hilaire and Lambert, respectively.

Monday a heavy fall of the beautiful mantled the earth and every passive object in a robe of white, producing a decidedly wintery appearance.

H. W. Barnes has a talent for invention. He has given up the idea of creating perpetual motion and has turned his faculties to something easier.

Ella Sprague has been suffering from a mild attack of diphtheria this week. Dr. Watson has been rendering efficient services and the little girl is improving.

P. J. McGuire, ex-county auditor, has returned from Superior, Wis., and has taken a position in the Land Office at Crookston.

Frank Hunt's line of hardware is so complete that it is a pleasure to look it over. For anything pertaining to hardware, call there and be made happy with a bargain.

Anybody wishing to take the Chicago Daily News, Minneapolis Journal or Times, can get them, delivered free at your homes, for 10 a week, from Victor Patnode.

Messrs. Louis Anderson, Erik Erikson Peter Brunsberg and Edd Brunsberg made us an enjoyable call Friday. They are all pleasant gentlemen—and good musicians.

Capt. DeMers, formerly of Fisher, now resides at St. Paul. He is rapidly declining in physical and intellectual capacity and his death at any time may be expected. Capt. DeMers is well known in Polk county.

Miss Flora St. Yves, our Terrebone friend and sucessful preceptress, was in the city Monday. The Gentilly people will miss her, while she will be heartily welcomed at Terrebone where she will teach this winter.

"Where are you goina, my pretty maid?" "To milk old Brindle, sir," she said. "May I go, too, my pretty maid?" The cow has a calf young sir," she said.

The cellar of the new schoolhouse has several feet of water in it and the foundation is being damaged. The poor location of this fine building is a source of regret. It also faces the wrong way.

Just what the acquisition of all that fine furniture in such a convenient location means, is what is at present ruffling the inquisitiveness of E. J. Garceau's friends. But as Ed won't tell by word or sign, all will have to—wait and see.

Mrs. August Hennings has been seriously ill the past week. Mrs. Hennings has had heavy responsibility of late and as female help is scarcer than gold in this place—her energy has led her to overtax her strength. It is gratifying to know she is much better.

A huge boquet was received by the Ralph family Monday from Kansas City with compliments of Mrs. J. Ducan, (nee Miss E. A. Ralph,) who was married last week. The boquet was one of surpassing gorgeuosness.

There will be a Chalk Talk under the auspices of the Presbyterian church next Tuesday evening, in their building on Broadway. The lecture will be comic. entitled "The artist's Portfolio" and is given by Mr. T. R. Stewart, of Caledonia, Minn. Mr. Stewart comes well recommended and we may expect a very enjoyable evening's entertainment. Go and have a good time. Adults, 35c, children, 15c.

Deer hunting, since Nov. 1, has attracted the attention of the Johnny-like members of our community. The complimentary fall of snow just in the right time gave the hunters an advantage, and the first day a number (of deer) were shot. Joseph Marco secured two, E. E. Fletcher, Freeman Fletcher and Rev. Jirah McCornack brought in three, Jake Detling and F. Detling two. Monday and Tuesday scarcely a spread but contained a dish of savory venison.

Jeoseph Laurent, of Terrebonne, was in town Tuesday and dropped in to set his subscription account to rights. He had a fine crop this year as usual—2,000 bushels of wheat, 1,723 bushels of oats and 700 bushels of barley, off of 180 acres. The wheat, he says, was all No. 1 Hard, bright, clear and sparkling. Mr. L. is one of those who seem to command prosperity and this happy faculty never deserts him, in good years or off years—God helps those who help themselves.

Our old townsman, Geo. Leech, whom many will remember, is still weaving spells with his talents and genius, now in the town of Emardville. Mr. Leech has alone and unaided, manufactured a thrashing outfit which will be operated by the winds of heaven. Mr. Leech has raised a considerable crop this year. The windmill and separator combined, each offsprings of his genius, will be in full operation next week. Mr. Leech was the superintendent of construction on the Wyer dam.

FRANK E. HUNT, P. M.

Saturday, about the hour of midnight, the frosty air resounded with a woman's voice crying "murder! murder!" It emanated from the residence of a prominent North Sider and parties going to and from the dance, as also all the neighbors of the vicinity, were for the moment paralyzed with apprehension. It seems the house was the scene of a conflict between the host and a boarder, who had, at that ill-conceived hour, undertaken to settle a difference of opinion by a test of muscular power and flattening efficiency. The difference of opinion was forcibly settled without having effected any fatality, the cries of "murder" being merely metaphorical ejaculations. There were for a time a large number of indignant lords strutting about in rather unconventional attire, threatening tar and feathers and sundry supplementary proceedings—but nothing so deplorable materialized. The boarders have sought other quarters and life on the North Side ebbs along with its usual placidity.

Man's characters lie at the tip of his pen.

When men are rejected they readily own themselves fools.

Some people are good because they can not bear to be unloved.

Civilization erases some evils, is blotting out others and marries the rest.

The more one knows of human nature the more one realizes that all are kin.

Avarice consoles itself with the thought that its victim was created for heaven.

What surprise when a friend betrays you—you have often betrayed yourself.

We often call people conceited when we realize but will not admit their title to esteem.

When writers generalize motherinlaws as terrors they forget that they are defaming mothers.

When you hear or read a fine thought, don't think your endorsement gives you credit for its conception.

Some people think it easier to reform others than themselves and work to this end from sheer goodnaturedness.

We can forgive our own sins and love ourselves continually. It is well to think of this before condemning others.

When men pity a poodle dog with a pink ribbon through his ears it is not because the dog is going the way of woman.

Why do people always expect something in the mail? Postmasters tell of men who have no earthly relatives and no living friends but who daily inquire for their mail.

Good resolutions are seldom formed when in the midst of temptation—it is an easy matter for the small boy to entertain religious sentiments when crossing a melon field in the winter time.

Gilroy: "Colonel Rox, who is worth two millions now began life without a cent in his pocket." Larkin: "That's nothing, I didn't even have a pocket when I began life."

Young Mother: "Do you think baby looks most like me or his pa?" Nurse: 'Like you mum. Mr. Jenkins is a mighty handsonme man." Advertisement Wanted—A competent and civil nurse.

Robillard's thrashing outfit will soon be at work, thanks to expedition in making repairs. The engine was badly disabled and would not have been put in order this season but for the press of work. The cost of repairs will be about four hundred dollars.

The Brunsberg String Band of Garfield arrived Friday morning to play for the dance advertised for Friday night—that night was a wild, uncanny one and kept everybody at home who was not conveniently located near the hall. The boys were not to be discouraged by the disfavor of the elements and held the dance Saturday night—when about twenty-five couples attended and a jolly time ensued. The music furnished by this band is excellent and their selections embrace many classical airs, all rendered in an enthusiastic able style which proclaims the musicians true artists. All present reveled in the delightful harmony—naught but the highest ecomiums could do it justice. The band embraces four—Peter Brunsberg and Edd Brunsberg, 1st violinist and bass violist; Erik Erikson, second violinist and Louis Anderson, cornetist. It would be difficult to analyze the individual merits of these players, but their united efforts are easily pronounced superb. They contemplate giving the Thanksgiving ball on Nov. 26. The dance should be well patronized and merit thus encouraged.

The notorious Dufour woman who resides at Crookston is very sharp. She has never been convicted though often overhauled by the authorities. At pres- in the grasp of the law, to be tried at the coming fall term of court, she would have again succeeded in escaping had it not been for a remarkable accident, which exposed her attempt to buy off the only important witness against her, who, it appears, was willing to remain in obscurity at the trial, from ignorance and goodnature. It looks very black for Madame Dufour at the present writing, owing to this unlooked-for upheaval of her plans. This woman, entrenched behind a repulsive barricade of vice, her nature veneered with habitual wickedness, a career of degradation, her heart callous from familiarity with depraved creatures, her mind revelling in lasciviousness, is a specimen of how much human character is the product of its surroundings. She was from infancy environed with temptations and her better instincts were suppressed by a degraded mother. With such a matrix for her character, it could but grow as it did. Tender hearted, impulsive, sympathetic, with an intellect remarkably brilliant, and mercurial ambition, this person possessed elements which, if properly cultivated and guarded, would have made her a specimen of noble womanhood; the reverse having been done, her present condition is the result.

TO THE BLACK HILLS.

The Great Northern Will Go There Next Year.

Sioux City, Iowa, Oct. 30.—The Nebraska & Western, or Pacific Short Line, which was brought yesterday at the receiver's sale at Omaha, will be extended early next year to the Black Hills. The line was located last year. Another line will also be built from O'Neil, Neb., to Dunning. The new owners of the road are the same as the owners of the Sioux City & Northern, which is operated virtually as a part of the Great Northern system.

Williams Hasn't Decided.

Independence, Iowa, Oct. 30.—C. W. Williams, when asked today if he seriously contemplated moving his track from Independence because of the antagonistic propensities of the sheriff and probitionists in regard to pool selling and the disposition of liquors, replied: "It's a matter I cannot make up my mind about." I will give a two weeks' meeting somewhere next year but whether it will be here or within 300 miles of here I cannot say."

The Soo Blockade Raised.

Chicago, Oct. 30.—The wreck of the steamer Susan E. Peck was raised from the bottom of the Soo river this morning and free passage to Lake Superior once more secured. Many marine men are urging that congress should adopt atrict regulations for the navigation of the narrow and crooked channel to Lake Superior by which the speed of boats shall be lessened. This is particularly needed at the bends in the river, where all the disasters occur.

A New Scheme.

San Francisco, Oct. 31.—Stewart Menzies, of this city, will submit to the newly organized California Traffic Association a plan to establish a line of freight steamships between San Francisco and New York or Liverpool, by way of the Straits Maggelan. WASHINGTON NOTES

Latest Telegraph News from the National Capital Condensed.

Doings of the Supreme Court the Executive and Other Departments.

The British sealers Otto and E. B. Marvin, seized in Bering sea, have been released by the direction of the United States commissioner of admiralty.

It does not seem at all certain that Gen. Raum is to "go." He says he has not resigned or been requested to do so, and the president himself said Tuesday morning, in answer to an inquiry, that he had not appointed Gov. Steele or requested Raum's resignation and did not know what his course would be in the matter.

As the civil service commission was not prepared to certify candidates for appointment in the Indian service on Oct. 1, when the rules were to have gone into operation, the president has extended the time until March 1 next, provided they go into operation in any district at an earlier date, if the commission finds itself prepared to make certifications.

Brigadier General Stanley, commanding the department of Texas, in his annual report says it is not always clear in policing the Mexican border how far the authority of the United States extends. He says the pay of the private soldier is insufficient and that he should receive the pay of a day laborer in the locality in which he serves. Desertions are reported to have decreased 50 per cent.

COAST DEFENSES NEEDED.

Maj. Gen. Oliver O. Howard, commanding the military department of the East, devotes much space in his annual report to the discussion of coast defenses. He says that at New York, San Francisco and Boston new guns and mortars are needed and recommends that a complete defense of the combined harbors of Savannah, Ga., and Port Royal, S. C., by works on Tybee, Hilton Head, Parry and St. Helena islands be established.

SYMPATHIZED WITH INSURGENTS.

The report from London that the United States naval squadron in Chilian waters displayed enmity to the congressional navy during the recent civil war in that country is wholly discredited at the navy department. One officer of high rank said he had positive information that while Admiral Brown, who commanded the squadron, was compelled to pursue a neutral course during the struggle, his personal symoathies and convictions were altogether with the congressionalists.

GEN. MILES' MILITIA PLAN INDORSED.

It is reported that the secretary of war in his annual report will recommend favorable action by congress upon that portion of Maj.-Gen. Miles' report in relation to a great gathering together of the militia at Chicago in 1893. Many of the leading general officers of the southern militia have requested their representatives in congress to favor this movement and ask for such an appropriation as will enable the views expressed by Gen. Miles to be carried into effect in a manner that will be creditable to the country.

RELATIONS WITH RUSSIA.

Dr. Waller Kempster is furnishing foreign correspondents with some highly colored stories as to what the United States immigration commissioners have discovered abroad. He says that the report which will be made will be of such a startling character that the United States will be compelled to cut off all diplomatic connections with Russia. The doctor's statements are taken with a good deal of allowance at the treasury and state department here. He fails to give any details of the extreme abuses he and his associates have unearthed, and confines himself to extreme adjectives which characterize his discovery.

YOUNG INDIANS MUST ATTEND SCHOOL.

The commissioner of Indian affairs has issued rules and regulations to enforce the attendance of Indian children of suitable age and health at schools established and maintained for their benefit. The rules prescribe that every Indian youth shall attend some school, but so far as practicable the preference of Indian parents or guardians, or of Indian youths of sufficient maturity and judgment, will be regarded as to whether the attendance shall be at government, public or private schools. Children of a suitable age is defined to include all between five and eighteen years of age. The suitable health of a child is to be determined by a medical examination. When necessary Indian police will be called upon to enforce attendance.

POSTAL DEPARTMENT FINANCES.

The annual report of the auditor of the treasury for the postoffice department shows that the postal revenues during the year were $65,931,785. The expenditures to Sept. 30, 1891, were $71,663,463, leaving an excess of expenditures of $5,730,677. The amount of balances due from late postmasters whose offices were closed by suspension is $330; by bad debts, $14,064; compromise debts, $3,483, making a net loss of $22,876. The amount of stamps, stamped envelopes, newspaper wrappers, letter sheets and postal cards sold during the four quarters of the past year was as follows: Sept. 30, $14,374,721; Dec. 31, $16,263,881; March 31, $16,514,343; June 30, $15,336,825, making a total of $63,539,775. The cost of mail transportation was $30,014,155.

THE CHILIAN AFFAIR.

Secretary Blaine returned to Washington Saturday and took up his official duties Monday. The first thing to engage his attention is the Chilian affair. It is understood that the ground was gone over by the president and the secretary of state pretty fully. Just now the navy is the most active exponent of diplomatic policy. While it is putting it rather strong to say that the navy department is preparing for war with Chili it is nevertheless a fact that the latest Chilian incident has served to give an additional impetus to work in the fitting out of ships for sea. There is naturally a hope that the Chilians will come to their senses and make proper reparation for the injury and insult to this country, and reasonable time will be allowed for them to act, but it is plainly seen that the affair may lead to war and the navy department does not desire to be found wanting as it has so many times in the past.

A MECHANICAL TYPESETTER.

A Michigan Printer Claims Wonderful Results From His Invention.

Muskegon, Mich., Oct. 30.—Erle Beals, of this city, has invented a typesetting machine. He visited Chicago last week and found nothing there among the typesetting machines exhibited similar in principle. The machine in operation will take the place of twenty men at the case. His invention consists of two seperate machines. The first of these corresponds to a typewriter and is operated by a compositor who works from the copy, but this, instead of being printed as a typewriter, is transferred to a piece of paper by perforations made by striking the keys on the finger board, the particular letter or character being determined by the distance of the perforation from a base line. This machine may be called the perforator and when the copy has thus been transferred to the strip of paper this is taken to the second machine, which, working automatically by electricity, sets up the type, and as each line is composed impresses it into matrix paper in a new way that makes a perfect mold or matrix of the line. The matrix paper moves along automatically as the lines are composed until a matrix is obtained for a column of matter. This is then ready for the stereotyping process. The action of the machine is entirely automatic and is also very rapid. The perforator can be operated as rapidly as a typewriter.

Chili Is Sorry.

Washington, D. C., Oct. 30.—The wind has been taken out of the Chilian affair by an offer of the rebellious little republic to make amends to the fullest limits of its ability. Chili has offered to apologize, give proper financial reparation to our injured sailors punish the soldiers, sailors and police in its service who fired upon our defenseless men in the streets of Valparaiso. This is all the United States has asked; all that could be expected, and it may be said truthfully that the crisis which we were represented as passing through has passed. Chili has named its diplomatic representative to this country. He is here in the person of Senor Montt, and negotiations are today making for the fullest reparation on Chili's part in connection with the affair which has attracted so much attention and considerable commotion.

Fastest Tree Heats Ever Made.

Columbia, Menn., Oct. 27.—Direct made the fastest three heats on record yesterday in his match race with Hal Pointer winning $3.000. The Tenneseeans bet their pile on Pointer, but Direct showed his superiority, easily winning the three heats straight. The time was 2:09, 2:08, and 2:08¾.

Villard's Prophecy.

Spokane, Wash., Oct. 30—Henry Villard, who is making a tour of the Northwest, said yesterday in an interview that he believed before long all trains on the Northern Pacific railroad would be operated entirely by electricity.

Subterranean Stream.

There are three artesian wells located almost on a line within a running distance of 2.000 feet in Sonoma, Cal., which yield between 2.000.000 and 5,000.000 gallons of water every twenty-four hours. A subterranean stream runs beneath the town.

HOW GRANT WENT BROKE.

He Bet His Last $40 on a Horse-Race and Lost.

One of the most interesting men I ever met in the judge's stand was Gen. Grant. The popular impression of Gen. Grant is that he was singularly reticent, but I found him to be pleasant and communicative.

I met him first when he was returning from his trip around the world. He had been through Mexico and stopped in New Orleans on his way home, and was the guest of Walter Fern who was minister to Greece under President Cleveland.

As president of the Louisiana Jockey club I invited Gen. Grant to come out and see our racing, says R. W. Simmons in the N. Y. World.

"The newspapers have been attacking me a great deal on account of my love for horses," said he, "and perhaps I had better not go." I told him he was no longer in office and that there could be no harm in his going. He finally consented, and was driven out to the track by Dr. Choppin, president of the Boston club. I invited him up into the stand and he chatted very freely.

"Do you know," said the general, "that I never hear of racing that I do not recall my experience in New Orleans in 1844. At that time I was a young lieutenant stationed at St. Louis. I went down to New Orleans to visit James Hewitt, and one day I accepted an invitation to go out to the track and see a horse-race.

"I do not remember the names of the horses that were running, nor do I recall the distance of the race. I only know that I was standing watching them when I saw one, a gray horse, about three hundred yards in front of the other.

"The excitement of the race overcame me, and I enthusiastically yelled out: 'I'll bet $40 on the gray horse.' A gentleman standing beside me said quietly: 'I'll take that bet.' I reached down to get my money, when he said in a courteous way: 'Your word is sufficient, sir.

"You can imagine my feelings when a few moments later my horse began to fall back and the other horse to move up. Presently the second horse pressed the gray and won very easily. Then I felt in my pocket and found that all the money I had in the world was just $40. I gave that to the gentleman who had won it, and went back to Mr. Hewitt's very much crestfallen.

"I was ashamed to tell Mr. Hewitt I had been such a fool as to lose my money on a horse-race, and I knew nobody else from whom I could borrow, and I wanted to go back to St. Louis.

"One day I was walking along the wharf, wondering how I was ever going to get back home, when I saw the steamboat J. M. White unloading. I knew this was a boat plying between St. Louis and New Orleans, and a brilliant idea occurred to me. Why not see the captain, tell him my story and ask him to trust me for a passage?

"I at once went on board and asked for the captain. I was told he was in the barbershop, and would be out in a few minutes. When the captain came in I said: 'Captain, I am Lieut. Grant, and I want to get to St. Louis, where I am stationed. I have no money.'

"'I shall be delighted to have you, lieutenant,' replied the captain. 'The boat leaves to-morrow afternoon at 5 o'clock; come aboard whenever you wish.'

"I have never forgotten that race, and I have never forgotten Capt. Swon's kindness."

About Spectacles.

The honor and credit of pointing out the benefit of glasses to aid the defective vision belongs to Roger Bacon, who lived from 1214 to 1292. Spectacles were actually invented in the year 1280, the man who conferred this great blessing on suffering humanity being a monk of Pisa who died in 1313.

In the early stages of the art the spectacles made were rude and crude, the glasses very rough; though they rendered great aid to the afflicted. At the present time an optician who understands his business can by successive experiments discover the actual defect of the eye and furnish a glass that will make the eye almost perfect. The perfection in the means of assistance is due to the experiments and inventions of Dr. Scheflier and Dr. Giraud of Paris. The latter scientist promulgated the idea and the former practically put the theory in operation.

Glasses are commonly ground with equal convexity on both sides. The material for their manufacture is both glass and a kind of stone called Brazilian pebble. It is really a rock crystal of very fine quality and does not resemble a "pebble" in any particular.—St. Louis Republic.

No Use for Fast Steamers.

Who wants to cross the ocean in a jiffy? What shall it profit a man to take a vacation simply to be shot from one place to another as from a catapult? Everybody agrees that the most restful thing about a journey abroad is the ocean voyage. The time spent on the water, where one is cut off from business, from mails, telegraph, newspapers, society and all that worries or annoys, is the best medicine imaginable for tired Americans. Why wish it shortened? When one can cross the ocean in two or three days the advantages and attractions of a foreign trip will be greatly lessened.—Indianapolis Journal.

A Musical Rooster.

A Guilford (Conn.) man owns a rooster with a musical ear. The fowl can crow the "Doxology" and has tried its voice at "Awake, My Soul, and with the Sun," but its favorite tune is either "Yankee Doodle" or "The Star Spangled Banner." Its owner refuses to teach it the popular airs of the day, but is hard at work drilling the bird in the music of several well-known hymn tunes.—Boston Herald.

A brother of Congressman Dolliver, of Iowa, has been elected President of the University of Utah, at Ogden. He is only 24 years of age, and will have a salary of $5,000 a year.

A Sequel.

She was a merry maiden, he was a jolly tar,
And they met on the beach when the waves were singing low,
And he named for her each distant and brilliant shining star,
And told the things about the sea she long had sought to know.

That was many months ago, so he thinks, and vainly sighs,
As he longs for wastes of water, and the roll of stately ships,
For the cross that burns resplendent in far off southern skies,
And the wind that bears sweet fragrance to the sailor's waiting lips.

For his cruising ground is changed to a chamber's narrow floor,
And the noise he hears, as slowly he paces to and fro,
Is not the distant echo of the tempest's savage roar,
Or the wash of waves that softly along the bulwarks flow.

Ah, no! it is the murmurs that from parted lips arise,
Red lips and sweet he thought them that night upon the shore,
And he coos unto the baby to still its sleepy cries,
And wishes he was back again on his ship's deck once more.

For that dainty vision yonder, in its robe of filmy lace,
Is queen indeed of all he does, as he said that she should be;
So he tends the baby while she sleeps a dream of peace and grace
And longs to see the topsails swell across a stormy sea.

DAPPLE'S MISTRESS.

"Stop, Dapple! We must look to this."

The scene was a green stretch of summer lawn in front of a fine old Virginia farm-house; the speaker, a slight, bright-faced girl, gracefully mounted on a small gray pony.

The sun was dropping out of sight behind the green hills, and far away down the silver bend of the Accoceek came the tramp of retreating troops, with now and then the muffled roll of a drum or the shrill blare of a bugle.

Old Virginia, the queen mother of the sunny south, was overrun with soldiers, devastated by fire and sword, shaken to her very foundations by the thunders of civil war.

Col. Moreton was far away from his pleasant home, in the front ranks of death and danger; but Irene, his only child, still braved the terrors of invasion and remained at the farmhouse with her invalid mother and a few faithful old servants.

Cantering across the grounds an hour after the retreat of the invading troops, something attracted the young lady's notice—a prostrate figure under the shade of the great cottonwood tree.

"Stop, Dapple; we must look to this!"

Dapple stopped, and Miss Irene leaped lightly from her saddle, and throwing the silken reins over the pony's neck, went tripping across the grounds to the spot where the figure lay.

It was a tall, soldierly figure, clad in army blue, with a pale, worn face and an abundance of curling, chestnut hair.

Col. Moreton's daughter looked down upon the senseless soldier with all her woman's divine compassion stirring within her bosom.

"Poor fellow," she murmured, laying her soft hand upon his brow; "I wish I could help him."

The soft voice and the softer touch called back the veteran's wandering senses. He opened his eyes and looked up in the young lady's face. Great, luminous, handsome eyes they were, that somehow reminded Irene of her brother Tom's eyes; and Tom was down in the trenches in front of Richmond. The compassion in her heart stirred afresh; she smoothed back the tangled curls from the soldier's brow.

"My poor fellow," she said, "can I do anything for you?"

He struggled up to his elbow with a stifled groan.

"My horse threw me," he explained, "and they left me behind. I think I must have fainted from the pain. I thank you very much, but I can't see how you can help me. I suppose I must lie here till they take me prisoner, and I'd almost as soon be shot."

Irene smiled, a smile that lighted her dark, bright face into positive beauty.

"I am in the enemy's country," she said, "but if you will trust me I think I can help you; at least, I will see that you are refreshed and made comfortable."

She put her hand to her bosom, and drawing forth a tiny whistle she put it to her lips and blew a sharp little blast.

Dapple pricked up his gray ears and came cantering to her side, followed instantly by a colored man-servant.

"You see," smiled Miss Irene, flashing a beaming glance on the soldier, "I hold my reserve forces at a moment's warning. Here, James, help this gentleman to the house, and then ride for Dr. Werter to dress his limb."

James obeyed without a word, and by the time the sun was fairly out of sight the union soldier, refreshed and made comfortable, lay asleep in the best chamber of the pleasant old southern mansion.

Meanwhile, on the long veranda, Irene kept watch, her slight, willowy figure wrapped in a scarlet mantle, her flossy, raven tresses floating on the winds.

By and by, as the midnight stars came out and glittered overhead, above the dreamy flow of the river, above the murmur and rustle of the forest leaves, arose the clash and clang, the roar and tramp of advancing troops.

Irene's dark face flushed and her lustrous eyes dilated. She crossed the veranda with a swift step and tapped lightly at the door of her guest's chamber.

"They are coming," she whispered; "they will take you prisoner if you remain. You must go."

The soldier started to his feet and made his way out, but he reeled against the door-post, faint and gasping for breath.

"I can't walk!" he cried; "there's no hope of escape!"

But Irene held out her lithe young arm.

"Yes, there is," she said, cheerfully. "Lean on me. I can help you down, and you shall ride Dapple. He knows the river road, and you shall overtake your comrades by dawn. Hurry! there is no time to lose!"

The soldier leaned upon the brave, helpful young arm, and succeeded in reaching the lawn below.

"Dapple!" the young girl called, in her clear, silver notes, "come here!"

In a breath Dapple was at her side. The girl stood and looked at the gentle creature and then threw her arms around his neck.

"Oh, Dapple, pretty Dapple," she sobbed, "it breaks my heart to part with you. Good-by, Dapple!"

In the next breath she stood erect, her eyes flashing through a mist of tears.

"Come, sir," she said, "allow me to help you to mount. Dapple, take this gentleman down the river road, and at your utmost speed."

Dapple uttered a sagacious whinny, but the soldier hesitated.

"Why don't you mount, sir?" cried the girl, impatiently. "Will you remain here and ruin both yourself and me?"

He vaulted into the saddle without a word.

"Away, Dapple, like the wind!" cried Irene, and the little mountain pony shot off like an arrow.

* * * * * * *

The war was over, and once more over the blasted and desolate homes of Virginia peace and freedom reigned.

Capt. Rutherford made it his business to go back to the Potomac hills and to Col. Moreton's farmhouse the moment he was discharged from service, but where the stately old homestead stood he found nothing but a mass of ruins and of Dapple's mistress not the slightest tidings could be obtain.

Three years went by, and the ex-captain found himself the wealthy heir of an old uncle and took himself off on a tour amid the Swiss mountains. Dapple went with him, as he always did since that eventful night when the brave little pony bore him safely beyond reach of the enemy. He had been the captain's inseparable companion in all his wanderings. He was with him now, ambling over the green Tyrol valleys and climbing the Switzer steeps.

One September afternoon, when the captain's tour was drawing to a close, somewhere in the vicinity of Mont Blanc he fell in with a traveling party from New Orleans. It consisted of Mme. Lenoir, her son and two daughters and a young American lady who was her companion and interpreter.

Capt. Rutherford found madam a charming woman, and while the young persons of the party busied themselves in spreading out a collation under the trees he lay amid the long, rustling grasses listening to madam's pretty feminine chatter, and in his turn relating incidents and reminiscences of his own war experience for her edification.

Among other things he told her of Dapple and of his midnight ride among the blue hills of old Virginia.

Madam was intensely interested.

"And the gallant little pony carried you safely through?" she cried, with beaming eyes.

"Safely through, madam, with the enemy at my heels," replied the captain.

"Miss Morton," cried madam, "will you have the kindness to pass the claret cup? And pray, Capt. Rutherford, what ever became of Dapple?"

The captain raised himself to a sitting posture.

"Dapple, Dapple," he called; "come here!"

From the forest shadows near at hand a small gray mountain pony came ambling forth. Mme. Lenoir's companion, advancing with the claret cup in her slim, white hand, uttered a sharp little cry and wasted all the luscious liquor on the rustling leaves at her feet.

"Oh, Dapple, Dapple!" she cried.

Dapple heard the sweet voice and knew it in an instant. He broke into a joyous neigh and shot like an arrow for the young lady's side. She caught his shaggy head and held it close to her bosom, sobbing like the silly child she was.

"Oh, Dapple, my pretty Dapple, have I found you at last?"

Madam Lenoir, comprehending the denouement, looked on with glistening eyes.

Two weeks later the pleasant party was breaking up. Madam and her party were going back to France.

"And now, Irene," said the captain, "how is it to be? You will not listen to my suit or accept my love? Then you will be forced to part from Dapple again. She is mine by right of possession. I cannot give her up. Come, now, give your final decision—are you willing to part from me and Dapple forever?"

Irene looked up with her old, glorifying smile.

"I could bear to part from you," she said, wickedly, "but never again from Dapple. If you take Dapple you will have to take her mistress, too, Capt. Rutherford."

And the captain made no objection. A month later saw Dapple's mistress the captain's wife.—Toronto Mail.

A Chinese Thief.

A retired sea captain relates that once while in China he spent one night ashore with another captain, when this adventure occurred: "I was awakened from a sound sleep by an agonized scream and a scuffle close to my head. Springing to the floor I saw my friend grappling with a native thief, who was as naked as the day he was born. Before I could lend a hand the robber broke away and dashed through the open window, a few feet from the ground, his long cue flying behind him. I turned and found my friend rolling on his couch in an ecstacy of pain. Making a light, I found that the flesh and skin had been torn clear away from the inside of one of his hands. The thief was prowling about the room when the captain awoke and made a grab at him. The fellow's naked body writhed out of his grasp like an eel. The captain caught the robber by the pig-tail, and then he was undone. The rascal had braided it full of fish-hooks, and the keen, barbed points just raked the flesh from the sailor's hand."

Elizabeth Bisland, who did some globe-trotting a few years ago, and has recently been in Europe, will soon marry a New York lawyer named Wetmore.

GIANT APES OF BORNEO.

Interesting Facts About Able-bodied Anthropoids that Live in Trees.

"My acquaintance with apes has been chiefly made in Borneo," said Prof. Henry A. Ward, the famous natural science collector of Rochester, to a Star reporter the other day. "That great island is the home of the orang, which is the most arboreal of all monkeys. The animals live in trees altogether, rarely, if ever, visiting the ground. It takes two good marksmen to shoot one, because they dodge around the trunks. They do all their fighting aloft, and it is great fun to see them drop the armfuls of fruit they have gathered in contests for its possession. They are plentiful in the low lands near the coast. It is rarely that anybody ventures into the interior, because there the head-hunting natives prowl. Among them each man is required to have secured a head before he is permitted to marry, and on this account the young gentlemen savages are continually looking about for somebody to kill. This makes travelling disagreeable.

"One of the most noticeable features of the landscape of Borneo is the nests of orangs which are scattered about thickly among the tall trees. From their number one might get a greatly exaggerated impression of the plentifulness of the species, unless it were understood how and for what purpose these roosting places are constructed. The beasts are greatly annoyed by flies, from which they are able to protect the front part of their bodies with their hands, but they cannot keep the vicious insects from biting them in the rear, and so they gather a quantity of leaves and branches and make them into couches to repose against among the boughs. A protection of this sort serves very well for a while, but presently this material begins to decompose and the decaying leaves attract the flies, which the orang is so anxious to get rid of. Then he is obliged to make another nest of fresh stuff, and so he may require dozens of them in the course of a year. Inasmuch as he does not take the trouble to remove the old ones, they remain to adorn the tree top in which he swings about.

"Orangs have a very curious method of fighting. In their conflicts among themselves, which are frequent, their effort is always to seize the fingers of their adversaries and bite them. A very beautiful group of these animals at the National Museum, mounted by Mr. Hornaday, admirably illustrates a typical encounter of the sort. It is owing to this method of battle that it is almost impossible to procure a skin which does not lack some of the fingers. If defending itself against a man the beast will always attempt to grab the arm of his human opponent, so as to chew off his fingers. For this purpose its jaw is excellently adapted, being enormously powerful and equipped with huge incisors.

"The favorite food of the orang is the 'durion' fruit, which is, perhaps, the most delicious in the world uniting, as it does, the flavors of the peach, the pear, and the strawberry. Like most things nearly perfect, however, this fruit has a drawback—namely, that it leaves a taste in the mouth the next day after it is eaten which is more abominable than can either be described or conceived. To protect itself from the rain the orang crooks its arms over its head. The hair on the orang's upper arm points downward, while on the lower arm it points upward, the apparent purpose being to shed the rain like a thatch when the attitude I have described is assumed.

"The other great ape which makes its home in Borneo is the gibbon, which is a small animal compared with the orang, weighing only about forty or fifty pounds. It is very frail in its bodily make-up. The head is set squarely upon the shoulders, and it looks upward. When walking on the ground it balances itself along like a walker on the tight rope. Its remarkable power of grasp and dexterity in using its hands is equally with the shape of its cranium an index of its superior intelligence, perhaps because it is able to take hold of a greater number of things and examine them. The gibbon is a natural acrobat. Its trapeze performances in trees are simply marvellous.

"The animals go in droves, whereas orangs live by families, and, one of the most interesting spectacles imaginable is to see a troop of them crossing a great gap in the forest by throwing themselves in succession through the air, each one taking a swing or two to gather momentum before launching himself. So great is their agility that in executing feats of this sort they seem like birds.

"Natives in the countries inhabited by great apes regard them always as human beings of inferior types, and it is for this reason that for a long time it was found impossible to get hold of an entire gorilla skin, because the savages considered it religiously necessary to cut off the hands and feet of the animals when they killed them, just as they do with their enemies, possibly for the purpose of rendering them harmless in case they should by any chance come to life again."—Washington Star.

A Cool Cloth Without Ice.

One of the most useful hints for sick-room attendance is very seldom known outside of a hospital ward, and not even there in many cases; the hint is how to obtain a cold cloth without the use of ice. Every one knows that in fevers or weakness a cold cloth on the forehead or face, or base of brain, is one of the most comforting things in the world. In the tropical hospitals, and where ice is scarce, all that is necessary is to wet a linen cloth, wave it to and fro in the air, fold it, and place on the patient. Have another cloth ready, waving it to and fro, just before applying it; these cloths have a more grateful and lasting coldness than those made so by the burning cold produced by ice.—The Ladies' Home Journal.

Mrs. John A. Logan declares that the only part she ever took in politics was to secure the advancement of her husband.

HARDWOOD FLOORS.

More Healthful Than Carpets, and Do Not Need Special Fumigating.

The most healthful flooring is the hard-wood, or its humbler relations, the painted or stained floors. They do not get full of dust and moths, and are readily cleaned. They remove the heaviest load from the semi-annual house-cleaning, while after contagious illness they do not need special fumigating. They are, on the other hand, expensive from their own cost, and from the rugs they require to remove the bareness and to reduce the household clatter. A house with wood floors throughout is a noisy place where the family is of any size. Hard floors are particularly fitted for dining-room, sleeping-rooms, the library and music-room; but halls, stairs and sitting-room are more comfortable carpeted. In the drawing-room a rich effect is more cheaply attained with carpet than with rugs, and the room being less used, its care is less burdensome.

Hard-wood floors are of maple, oak, or Georgia pine, and should be tightly laid and "blind-nailed." The expense varies with locality. Wood-carpeting, or American parquetry, is a recent and successful effort to supply a floor equally as good as a permanent hard-wood floor, but more easily applied. The wood, either walnut, oak, cherry, or any two alternately, is one-quarter of an inch thick and in narrow strips or blocks, which are glued to a cloth back. The straight carpeting comes 20, 28 and 36 inches in width, and will roll up like oil-cloth, weighing 7 pounds to the yard. Plain borders are made in 3 1-2, 5 and 6 inch widths, and corners, centre-pieces and strips to form mitre lines come in the various woods. Such carpeting costs from $1.50 to $18 per square yard, that for the latter price being designed intricately with centre-pieces and elaborate borders in oak, cherry, mahogany, maple, rosewood and walnut. These prices are for the goods uncut and measured before laying, the laying and finishing being separate expenses. Only carpenter or cabinet-maker can lay those carpets, full directions being given by the firms that supply them.

A carpet of this kind, including the laying and finishing, will cost about the same as a body Brussels carpet of the same size, and will last a lifetime. It can be laid over an ordinary floor, and being so thin, doors and thresholds do not have to be cut down. To order it, make a drawing of the shape of the room, showing where are all the windows, doors, projections and recesses, and carefully measuring and indicating the spaces.

Some floors are too poorly laid to be painted or stained, and the cost of hard-wood or wood-carpeting must be avoided. In such a case, "kiddermaster," a heavy ingrain, is an excellent and warm covering. It is a yard wide, alike on both sides, comes in all plain colors, and costs 80 cents a yard. It makes an effective background for rugs, but looks well when used alone. —Harper's Bazar.

"No Public Speaker."

Richard Coleman of Virginia, while yet a very young man, was made judge of one of the eastern Circuit courts, says the Youth's Companion. Before his appointment he had led a quiet, studious life, and had obtained no extended reputation except among lawyers.

Shortly after he went upon the bench a cruel murder was committed in his district by a notoriously bad man. The murderer was taken, tried and convicted of murder in the first degree.

In pronouncing the sentence of the law upon the prisoner Judge Coleman spoke with so much feeling and eloquence that many of the listeners were moved to tears. The murderer, on the other hand, seemed to be quite indifferent, looking at the ceiling and apparently paying no attention whatever to what was being said.

After he was remanded to jail one of the young lawyers went into the cell, curious to know how the criminal had felt when the judge was passing sentence upon him.

"What do you mean?" asked the murderer.

"I mean when the judge was telling you that you were to be hanged."

"You mean when he was talking to me?"

"Yes."

"Oh! I never paid no 'tention to Dick Coleman; he ain't no public speaker, nohow."

Paddy Got a Free Dinner.

At many of the restaurants in Boston a metal check, very much like a silver quarter, is given by the waiter to the customer as a ticket for what he has to pay. A simple-minded Irishman, who had just arrived in Boston from Tipperary, going into a well-known restaurant on Washington street, called for dinner. When the waiter had brought it he laid down the metal counter.

Paddy, astonished, said to himself: "Be jabers, this is the land for me; when a man asks for some dinner they give him a bit of money besides."

When he had swallowed his meal the delighted Paddy started to leave the restaurant without settling with the cashier, when he was stopped by the waiter, with: "Hallo! where's your money; are you going without paying?"

"Why would ye be after giving me the bit of money at all if ye meant to take it away again? Take yer dirty money! Perhaps ye'll be after wishin' me to return me dinner to ye again?"

So saying, Paddy threw the meal check down on the counter and marched off in a state of virtuous indignation, leaving the waiter and proprietor standing in a most amazed manner.—Boston Traveller.

A Detroit lady has for the last six months regulated the air of her room by a glass transom. When the room was too close she opened the transom to admit air, closing it at night to prevent draughts and exclude noise. It worked like a charm until she discovered that there had never been any glass in the transom.

A RUSSIAN ROMANCE.

Result of a Father's Yielding to His Daughter's Wishes.

There died the other day in Russia the renowned Prince Jussnapow, who was worth several hundred millions of rubles. He had been for many years a widower, with two beautiful daughters, of whom the younger died three years ago, but he had no male heir to take his title and great fortune. In 1882 the elder daughter, while at a ball, was seriously enamored of a handsome young lieutenant, Count Sumorokow-Elston, who also paid very great attention to the young princess, but without thinking about the possibility of a marriage with her, he being a poor lieutenant and she the richest heiress in Russia. Two days after the ball the young lady went to her father and told him of her love, adding that she could not and would not live without Count Sumorokow.

The prince at first was very much surprised at hearing this, as he had counted on a different husband for his daughter, who, the year before, had even refused to wear the crown of Bulgaria. However, conceiving that he could do nothing in this case, he promised his daughter his consent if the count's previous life would not hinder a connection with him. The result of investigations showed that the count was at all events a nobleman, and the old prince thereupon visited him in his modest dwelling. The prince spoke very openly to him, told him that he had made a deep impression on his daughter, who was of the opinion that she had made an impression on the count. If such was the case the count would be very welcome in the Jussnapow palace. The count immediately followed the prince to the palace. After a short time the wedding took place, and one can scarcely find a happier couple in all Russia.

When the old prince saw his daughter's happiness and the noble character of his son-in-law he requested and got permission from the emperor to adopt him and now, after the death of the prince, the once poor lieutenant has the title of prince of Jussnapow and the immense inheritance of several millions in bonds, much real estate in excellent condition and the family palace, containing almost incalculable riches in gold, silver, jewels and works of art. As an example can be mentioned a great gold service, used only on very great occasions, as when, for instance, the imperial family were the old prince's guests in his palace.

Just Like a Railroad King.

Many times I have seen items in the American papers which said that the queen of England traveled very plainly; that her private carriage was no better than any other first-class English carriage. I wish right here to say that these reports are based upon no authentic evidence. An official of the Midland road took me into the queen's carriage as it stood in St. Pancras station, and I must say it is as fine as any Pullman car ever built—and that is saying a good deal. The walls of the saloon are of satinwood highly polished. The cushions are of white silk embroidered in gold thread. A garter containing her motto, "Honi soit qui mal y pense," surrounds her initials, V. R. Her large chair—and it takes a large one, too—is at the back of the carriage and faces the engine. At her hand is a silver plate in which are electric annunciators, pressing which she can call her different attendants who occupy another compartment. Three other easy chairs are in her compartment, besides a satin-wood table about six feet long and three feet wide, upon which were piled the latest English, French, German and American periodicals. The carpet is of velvet, and in a good state of preservation, considering it has been in use over fifteen years. The curtains at the windows and a portiere are hung on silver poles. The door-handles are solid silver, and the whole saloon has the appearance of solid luxury. Victoria, herself, selected the furnishings, which are said to pattern after the white drawing-room at Windsor Castle. The whole saloon, with fittings, cost between $30,000 and $35,000. The carriage is about half the length of an ordinary American railroad car. At first sight the carriage impressed me as being gaudy, but this idea wore away in a moment.

The railway official informed me that the queen paid about $1.90 per mile for traveling, besides first-class fare for each of her party. As the official from whom I received my information was in a position to know, this explodes other reports that the queen and her suite always travel free. —Frank Leslie's Weekly.

Sighting a Ship Gun.

Did the reader ever sight a six-inch gun? Probably not. It is done something like this: First you approach the gun and look wise, giving a sort of a squint along it to where, out through the opening, you see the target bobbing on the waves. This is necessary, and if omitted the gun probably would not go off, but then it never has been known to be omitted. On either side of the gun are men bending the big steel cranks. On the port side of the gun, at the breech, is a man grasping a wheel. Wheels and cranks are, of course, attached to the gun carriage. Then you take the end of the firing lanyard in one hand and step back a few paces, looking through the rear-sight. If the rear-sight, the front-sight and the target are all in a line you pull the string and the gun does the rest. But they never are in range, and you have to say "right," "left," "raise," "lower," and the men at the cranks and the wheel grind away until the fortunate moment arrives that the two sights and the target are caught on range, and the gun is fired. Of course they never are in range when you think they are, but that is the way to fire the gun. The writer fired one of the Concord's six-inch guns several times and hit Long Island sound every time, which was considered rather good for a beginner.—N. Y. Tribune.

Caution!—There have recently been issued several cheap reprints of the 1847 edition of Webster's Unabridged Dictionary, an edition long since superannuated. These books are given various names,—"Webster's Unabridged," "The Great Webster's Dictionary," "Webster's Big Dictionary," "Webster's Encyclopedic Dictionary," etc., etc.

Many announcements concerning them are very misleading, as the body of each, from A to Z, is 44 years old, and printed from cheap plates made by photographing the old pages.

A Reunited Parish

Will Soon Erect a handsome New Church Edifice Over the Ashes of the Old St. Joseph's Church—The Building and it's Cost—The Fair.

Ever since St. Joseph's church went up in smoke two years ago the parishioners have been without a suitable place of worship, and have constantly felt the need of a new building. The destruction of the old church left this parish in a dismal situation—disunited, greatly in debt, records destroyed. The outlook is brighter now and the sum of prosperity seems to have risen. All antagonism and dissension has vanished, and the once large congregation begins to recognize itsself agian. When Fr. Arpin took charge of the parish the debt was $2,900. From the proceeds of the fair last winter and other sources, $1,200 was paid. The present statement shows an acknowledged debt of $900 and $800 not acknowledged, being claims for debts contracted by individuals interested in the church but not for church purposes. This shows the congregation to be in fair shape financially. The present intention is to have the new building completed for use by January next, if possible, but not later than March. It is to be 50x90 feet and will cost about $5,000—it will naturally be an ornamental structure and grace the architecture of our city. Right here we will make a suggestion as to its location on the church lot- it would be a pity to crowd the building too near the parsonage when the church lot is large enough to give them both a graceful site. The most balanced and pleasing effect would be obtained by placing the new structure in the centre of the vacant space east of the parsonage.

Arrangements for the fair which will be held the three days preceding New Years, are progressing systematically. It will be a fair managed entirely by the fair. The officers are: Mrs. Isaiah Marchildon, president; Miss Rebecca Brunelle. vice president; Miss Louise Labissouiere. secretary and treasurer; Miss Mattie Gervais, committee-lady at large. The election contests and contestants will be: Miss Elodia Bray and Miss Mattie Gervais, for silk dress; Mrs. M. Verboncouer and Mrs. M. F. Gagnon, for chamber suite; Miss Evelyn Paul and Miss Laura Cyr. That the fair will be well patronized goes without saying.

A subscription has been started for funds to build the church, $500 having been immediately subscribed.

A Little Girl's Experience in A Lighthouse.

Mr. and Mrs. Loren Trescot are keepers of the Gov. Lighthouse at Sand Beech, Mich. and are blessed with a daughter four years old. Last April she was taken down with Measles followed with a dreadful Cough and turning into a Fever. Doctors at home and at Detroit treated her, but in vain, she grew worse rapidly, until she was a mere "handful of bones."—Then she tried Dr. King's New Discovery and after the use of two and a half bottles, was completely cured. They say Dr. King's New Discovey is worth its weight in gold, yet you may get a trial bottle face W. A. Schreiter's Drugstore.

The Mystery Solved.

A jockey overheard a conversation in a stable that excited his curiosity and lead him to make a thorough investigation which resulted in the following valuable discovery. That Metzger's Angleworm and Wormwood Oil Liniment for horses has no equal as it keeps their joints limber and gives them good action, and for sprains, etc., it cures quickly, as every one is aware of the penetrating qualities of angle and wormwood oil. Call on W. A. Schreiter and get a bottle as he reports it's giving universal satisfaction. Price 50c and $1 per bottle.

The Calendar.

How many men who have a calendar of the year hanging beside their desks—how many of the people who can't keep house without an almanac,—know that about three hundred years ago a very important change was made in our reckoning of time? Up to the time of Julius Cæsar, the Romans divided the year into ten months, of very unequal lengths. One of the chief purposes of a calendar is to mark a fixed date as the beginning of a year, and to do this, it should be always at the same distance from the spring and fall equinoxes. In the time of Cæsar, the science of astroomy was not very exact and the small error of eleven minutes in the length of the year was made. In the sixteenth century the churchmen, who had a great many religious festivals, found that whereas the equinox was on March 25th when the Julian Calendar was made, in 1582 it had fallen back to March 11th. The great festival of the church, Easter was thus getting back into winter. Pope Gregory XIII came to the rescue, and after consultation with the learned of the day, issued, in October, 1582, a brief by which the date was arbitrarily advanced ten days—and thatis our present calendar. Russia, under the Greek church, did not follow this, and still keeps the old style. To always have the correct date in your home or office, get one of the calendars issued by "The Burlington," and to meet your engagements in other places, buy your railroad tickets over that line. All information will be given by agents, or can be had by applying to W. J. C. Kenyon, Gen. Pass. Agent C., B. & N. R. R., St. Paul, Minn.

Disaster And Death!

A Boiler Explodes on the Ames Place, With Probably Fatal Results.

The Boiler Inspector Had Warned The Proprietor That it Was Unsafe.

About eleven o'clock this forenoon the Ames & Barker thrashing engine boiler exploded, fatally mangling Lucius Ames, and injuring Alrin Barker, the engineer and Steve Ford.

About 2:30 Joe Poirier who was a member of Ames & Barker crew excitedly drove in for Dr. John Watson, and gave a report of the above disaster. The crew were moving the traction 16 horse power engine from the old Turwell place three miles this side of St. Hilaire. A man by the name of Anderson came up to talk with Ames about thrashing, and the engine was stopped, under a pressure of while Anderson and Ames talked. Joe Poirier had gone ahead with the water tank and had gotten about thirty rods away, when he looked back and saw Ames approach the engine—no sooner had he reached it than there was a deafening explosion, and when the steam cleared away the sight was appalling. Poirier drove back directly, and found the four men and one horse stretched on the ground amid the debris, blood and water mingled in pools upon the ground. Steve Ford and Alrin Barker were the first to regain consciousness. Ford had been struck in the forehead and otherwise badly hurt, while Barker's injuries were also serious, though it is not thought either are in danger. But Ames was expected to survive only a few minutes. He was in a comatous condition and presented a terrible aspect, being while his face had assumed a purple hue and blood oozed here and there. The off horse hitched to the engine was lying dead, while its companion had escaped uninjured. It was a scene of

APPARANTLY LIFELESS

BATHED IN BLOOD

DEATH AND DESTRUCTION.

The machine is entirely demolished, nothing but two large wheels remaining on the spot. The governors flew twenty rods and were found on the railroad track. There is nothing but shattered iron left—the different parts of the machine lying in all directions about the field. The escape of the other men is miraculous. It is stated that last year and pronounced unsafe. It is a 16-horse-power engine and the inspector warned the proprietor not to use the machine in the future, but if he did to allow 110 pounds as the utmost pressure, and to consider that as the danger point. Barker, the present engineer, was and can therefore not be blamed. The pressure was 120 pounds when the explosion occurred. New flues had been put in this year but one leaked badly and the use of the machine must have been recognized as dangerous. The unfortunate Ames was an unmarried man and lived with his parents. His mother died last week.

THE BOILER WAS INSPECTED

His Curiosity Was Gratified.

A stranger stood alone in the street of a great city. His hat was napless his boots covered with the dust of travel. Around him on every side a hurrying throng pushed and jostled in mad haste. He turned to a friendly policeman and said: "Say: Where be all these people gwine"! The officer was dumfounded at such ignorance Where are they going? Why, to purchase tickets via the popular Wisconsin Central If you are going anywhere you want to go with the crowd and ride on the best track in the most comfortable cars and with the greatest ease you ever experienced". For tickets berths and further information apply to any ticket agent.

BOUGHT A PAPER.

Carter Harrison Now Sole Proprietor of the Chicago Times.

CHICAGO, Nov. 3.—Carter Harrison is at last a full fledged editor. He has had ambitions along this line for many moons, and some time ago it was rumored semi-officially that he was about to buy the Times. These rumors were not unfounded, for yesterday the negotiations between Mr. Harrison and Proprietor Huiskamp were closed whereby the former gets the entire control of the paper. Mr. Harrison is thoroughly imbued with the newspaper idea.

"Yes," he said to a reporter, "I am now in entire control of the Times, and I will continue so just as long as I desire. The money—I will not say how much—has been paid over and I am in absolute control. Not another person owns a dollar in the property and not another person has the least thing to say about its management."

LEARNING TO EAT HOECAKE.

Minister Phelps Has Bacon and Corn Bread at a Banquet.

BERLIN, Nov. 4.—Minister Phelps has taken a peculiar and highly original way of introducing American meats and the great American staple, Indian corn, to the attention of Berliners and of Germany generally. He gave a dinner Saturday to a number of notabilities and their wives, including Dr. Miguel, minister of finance: Dr. de Boetticher, secretary of the interior, and a number of other leading men of the empire and of Prussia. The banquet included all the luxuries of the season, and was of the highest order in every respect, but chief and peerless among the dainties from an American point of view was the bacon and corn bread from America.

The treasury department has decided that a machine made in 1841 is not an antiquity.

The president has appointed Iver E. Shelley register of the land office at Devil's Lake, N. D.

Third Auditor Hart in his annual report says the horse claims division shows 5,014 claims on hand, many being cases growing out of the Mexican war.

The assault on William W. Jacques and daughter of Boston by a mob in Florence, Italy, last May, has been investigated by the state department and Mr. Jacques has received a letter from Acting Secretary of State Wharton stating that there is no evidence to show that the assault was on account of Mr. Jacques' nationality.

The treasury balance is gradually increasing notwithstanding the steady redemption of 4½ per cent bonds and the disbursement of over $10,000,000 this month on account of pensions. The declared balance Wednesday was $143,771,051, including the $100,000,000 gold reserve, $15,450,855 subsidiary coin, and $15,538,191 on deposit with national banks.

AFFECTS SOLDIERS' CLAIMS.

Second Auditor Patterson in his annual report to the secretary of the treasury suggests that Sec. 277 of the Revised Statutes be so modified as to authorize the second auditor to disallow claims for arrears of pay and bounty in cases where the muster and pay rolls or other records of his office show that the soldier or his heirs have received all they are entitled to under the law; provided that if the claimants are dissatisfied they within six months appeal to the second controller, otherwise the auditor's action shall be deemed final and conclusive, and be subject to a revision only by congress or the proper courts.

COURT-MARTIALS IN THE ARMY.

In his annual report to the secretary of war Col. Lieber, acting judge advocate-general of the army, says that during the year ended Sept. 30 there were 1,937 trials by court-martial, including eight commissioned officers tried by general courts, showing an increase of 135 cases as compared with the preceding year. There were 13,835 trials by garrison and summary courts in the various departments, or 335 more than during the preceding year. The number of acquittals in these interior courts was 3,113, and the number of enlisted men tried was 8,110, many having been tried more than once. The report refers in terms of high praise to the workings of the new law providing a uniform scale of punishment for military offenses.

FAVORS MOBILIZATION.

Inspector General Breckinridge, in his annual report to the secretary of war, speaks of the advisability of holding a grand encampment of the National militia and the regular army some time during the World's Fair. He says the inspections of the year show the militia to be in excellent shape, and that it is a guaranty of the security of the nation. He adds that of the regular army there is no reason for this country to be ashamed. Touching the militia again, he says it is chiefly deficient in campaigning, skirmishing through rough country, field intrenchments, and night work of the camps. He remarks that many of them are as good coddling machines as a first-class hotel.

MONTT IS PACIFICATORY.

Senor Pedro Montt, the Chilian minister to Washington, while loath to inject his views into the newspapers, desires to state upon the information in his possession that the reports published recently of ill feeling between the Chilian people and the Americans domiciled among them are sensational and absolutely without foundation in fact. He says that the Americans in Chili are generally old residents, extremely popular among the Chilians and are always courteously treated and respected. He holds that the Baltimore incident has been unduly magnified, and sees no reason to doubt that a settlement of the questions at issue between the governments of Chili and the United States will be reached in a manner honorable to both sides.

WORK ON THE OFFICIAL WAR HISTORY.

The war records board, in its annual report, says that during the last fiscal year twenty-one books were printed and distributed and four more put in type and partially indexed. These volumes contain the reports of the Mine Run campaign of the Army of the Potomac, the operations on the Atlantic coast in 1863, the Chickamauga campaign, the Chattanooga, Rossville and Knoxville campaigns, including the battles of Mission Ridge, Lookout Mountain and the siege of Knoxville, together with the operations of all the armies down to and including the Wilderness campaign in Virginia and the operations in the Shenandoah Valley, Maryland and Pennsylvania up to Aug. 3, 1864. The volumes relating to the transmississippi region have been completed to include June 30, 1891, and those relating to the Atlantic seacoast to Nov. 30 of the same year. The volumes covering the military operations of 1864 will probably be put in type during the present fiscal year.

NICKEL ARMOR THE BEST.

The important armor plate trials at the naval proving grounds on the banks of the Potomac demonstrated beyond a shadow of doubt that nickel to some extent will figure in the plate finally adopted as the standard for our warships. This is the one important deduction to be made from the trial. Further than this ordnance experts with unbiased views will not venture a prediction as to which one of the eight plates employed in the contest will be victorious until more of them have been tried. All steel plates, both plain and Harveyized, are now out of the race, for previous trials have shown the plain steel of various degrees of carbon to be unequal to nickel-alloy plates, and the trial left no room for doubt that the plain steel hardened by the Harvey process was not a match for the nickel-alloy plates of either high or low carbons, although it took two shots at each plate to determine this, for in the first series of rounds the Harvey plate stood the test the best. The contest has therefore narrowed down to nickel-alloy plates of high or low carbon untreated and nickel-alloy plates of high or low carbon treated by the Harvey process of decarbonization.

SETS THE CHILEANS FREE.

The Defendants in the Celebrated Itata Case Declared Not Guilty.

LOS ANGLES, Cal., Nov. 6.—Judge Ross of the United States Circuit court to-day granted the motion of the defendant to instruct the jury to return a verdict of not guilty in the case of the United States against George A. Bart and Ricardo Trumbull, who have been on trial here for a week charged with fitting the Chilean steamer Itata with arms to cruise against the government of Chile.

The court grants the motion on two points: First, that the indictment is defective, being formed under the neutrality laws, in not stating that a state of war existed in Chile and that defendants were belligerents and had been recognized as such. The charges would not hold because the statute contemplated a state of war, also that the vessel coming to the United States to get arms and carrying them peaceably away was not fitting out any expedition that had already been set on foot in Chile and was being conducted from there, not from the United States.

This decision will also result in dismissing the cases against the vessel and her arms.

The Elections.

COLUMBUS, O., Nov. 5.—The latest returns show that McKinley (Republican) carried the state by a plurality of between 15,000 and 20,000. Intense interest was taken in the election throughout the state and a heavy vote was polled.

NEW YORK, Nov. 6.—Roswell P. Flower (Democrat) goes up Harlem river with 75,000 plurality, while it is something of a question whether Fassett (Republican) can bring 50,000 down to that point. New York gave Flower 58,000 plurality and Brooklyn gave him about 14,000.

DES MOINES., Ia., Nov. 6.—The late returns give the state to Boies (Democrat) by 8,000 to 9,000 votes. The country vote, not yet all in, may reduce this somewhat. The election passed off quietly, and a heavy vote was polled. The legislature is yet in doubt, both parties claiming it, and it may take an official count to decide it.

Each Nation Wants Peace.

PARIS, Nov. 4.—M. Jules Simon, the distinguished French statesman and political economist and foreman chief of the republican party, in an interview published today said that he did not think war was probable. He added. "While I was in Berlin as a delegate to the international labor congress Emperor William told me that he desired peace, and the tone in which he said so left no doubt in my mind that he was sincere. The Czar also wants peace and France will not be the nation to commence hostilities in Europe."

At another portion of the interview M. Simon was quoted as declining to venture to say whether or not the Franco-Russian intente included the agreement to expel England from Egypt. In this connection (Egypt) M. Simon said that he did not credit Russia with having any designs to conquer India, but the speaker held that Russian expansion in Asia was only natural.

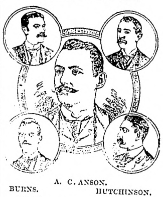
CAPT ANSON.

Of the Chicago Baseball Club.



A. C. ANSON.

BURNS. HUTCHINSON.

RYAN. PFEFFER.

Adrian C. Anson, of the Chicago Baseball Club is one of the best known players in the country. He is certainly one of the ablest team managers. In no year has he brought together a finer set of ball players and showed greater generalship. In a close game the chances for a victory are generally on his side, as his men, becoming enthusiastic under his leadership, frequently bat out victorious in the ninth inning. No Captain has so enriched the coffers of any club as he has those of the Chicagos. Capt. Anson has an instinct for determining the chances a young player may have for success. His able lieutenant is the old Chicago favorite, Tom Burns, and next to him stands Fred Pfeffer, whose great play in the recent series of games at Brooklyn was a feature of the contests there. Next comes Left Fielder Ryan and then the old Yale College graduate, Hutchinson whose swift and strategic pitching has done so much to place the Chicago colts' team at the head of the competition in the present pennant race. It is a fact worthy of special note that the club has never had a team in the field that has worked together in such thorough harmony as the team Anson is proud in calling his colts. The fight for the pennant is between Boston and Chicago, but certainly the chances are in favor of Chicago.

THE CHILIAN MATTER.

Chili Will Be Allowed Further Time in Which to Act.

WASHINGTON, D. C., Nov. 6.—A flutter of excitement ran through the state, war and navy departments today when it was learned that Senor Montt, the Chilean minister, who was in conference with Secretary Tracy. These departments are all under one great roof and the three secretaries are located on one floor. After the conference the Chilean minister went with Secretary Tracy to the state department, where Mr. Blaine was seen. The three were together for some time.

It was learned later that Senor Montt was about leaving the city for a week at New Orleans and that he was simply inquiring about the report of Capt. Schley of the Baltimore, who investigated the attack upon our seamen in the streets of Valparaiso, and that he wished to ask for further time in which the authorities at the Chilean port may make further inquries and report upon the affair in question.

The departments of Senor Montt for a week's absence indicates that there will be no developments of importance during that time and that, as stated some days ago in these dispatches, further steps in the direction of peace or war will not be taken soon.

The instructions issued by the secretary of the navy to the United States squadron on the coast of Chili at the beginning of the Chilean disturbance are now made public. Secretary Tracy says: "The instructions have been rigorously adhered to throughout. In no single instance have they been departed from. They prove conclusively that the charges of partiality made by the English newspapers are untruths, and that they have been invented in order to prejudice the Chileans against the United States for commercial purposes."

"Now They're Off."

PIERRE, S. D., Nov. 6.—Gov. Mellette has issue a proclamation recognizing the Yankton commission, which shows that he a zealous worker for South Dakota's world's fair exhibit. In this proclamation he shows his confidence in the selection of the representatives of the people who have been chosen on the commission. He also approves the appointment by this commission of the board of lady managers. Work will now proceed with greater zeal than before and the necessary funds will be secured without much drumming. Hon. T. H. Conniff, the financial director of the commission, leaves here on Wednesday morning for a trip over the state in the interest of the exhibit, especially in regard to raising $80,000 required by the commission for world's fair purposes.

The Hennepin Canal

CHICAGO, Nov. 6.—District Attorney Milchrist returned from Peoria today, having finished condemnation suits to secure a portion of the right of way for the Hennepin Canal. A strip five miles long beginning at the mouth of the Rock river and continuing up the river was secured and the government engineers are ready to begin work on the canal. Excavations will be made as soon as the secretary of war approves of the condemnation proceedings. The work will be done by contract and will be supervised by government engineers. The canal is to be 200 feet in width and will open a waterway from the Illinois river to the Mississippi.

Healy Horsewhipped.

DUBLIN, Nov. 6.—M. McDermott, nephew of the late Parnell, today publicly horsewhipped Timothy Healy the most bitter of anti-Parnell leaders. The horsewhipping was the direct outcome of the language used by Healy at Longford Sunday last, when the anti-Parnell leaders referred to Miss Parnell and to the widow of the late Charles Stewart Parnell. Healy was rescued by the police, who arrested McDermott. Healy declined to make charges against his assailant, and McDermott was released.

Cuckoo Clocks.

She sa'd that she'd be the little man's wife,
And there came the happiest day of his life,
While the neighbors with gifts prepared to flock—
"I'd like the most," she told him, "a cuckoo clock."

A roguish twinkle was in his eyes,
Pleasantly hinting of some surprise,
And, while they were talking, they heard a knock,
And a little boy brought in a cuckoo clock.

Then a package came which had been expressed
By a dear acquaintance who lived out west,
While from it there sounded a faint "tick-tock,"
And blest if it wasn't a cuckoo clock!

Mrs. Smith appeared with her friend Miss Jones,
And said the latter, in laughing tones,
"I've asked Mrs Smith what's in her box,
And I find that we've both brought cuckoo clocks."

The little jeweler fol'owed them.
"Best wishes!" he said. "Ahem! ahem!
I've just been looking over my stock,
And I thought I'd give you a cuckoo clock."

And was that the last one? Oh, dear, no!
They'd found out the gift that she'd most prize, so
All the neighbors for blocks and blocks
Kept on coming with cuckoo clocks.

"Oo-hoo!" "Oo-hoo!" "Oo-hoo!" "Oo-hoo!"
'T would have set me frantic, wouldn't it you?
No plate, nor pictures, nor glass, nor crocks—
All cuckoo clocks! All cuckoo clocks!

—Malcolm Douglas, in St. Nicholas.

CUPID'S SERVITOR.

Like a batch of bread made with stale yeast—sodden and sour—was the face of Clymer Ames. He was the very last man you would have supposed to be the salaried servitor of Cupid. Yet, so fond of paradoxes is Fate, that this man, who had eschewed Love, made his bread and butter by serving him. But, like all who wait on Love with interested motives, he received nothing but dross for his pains.

Yet one day it happened that his fickle master had placed before his eyes those illuminating glasses which turn the common sky into heaven, which convert life into a lyric and woman into a creature of perfume and melody and light.

But the next day, as one may see, these glasses were taken off again, and Clymer Ames had never looked through them since.

Yet every day from 8 in the morning till 5 in the afternoon this man, who could have killed Eros for his perfidious conduct, was obliged to toil in his behalf. He was, in short, the clerk who issued the marriage licenses. When he first went into the service of the greatest of cosmopolitans, Cupid, he dedicated to him a very bad chirography, a totally uneducated perception and an indefatigable industry.

In the course of a few weeks spent behind the little window in the county Court's spacious apartments, the chirography of this young man began to improve. So did his perceptions.

He could tell, when a man approached him, whether he had family pride or not; whether or not he was sentimental and impatient; whether he was inclined for hymeneal display; whether he was happy or fearful; whether he was going to marry a woman of whom he was proud or only one with whom he was in love.

Clymer Ames, who at first saw only the stage-carpentering and scene-shifting in this drama of the emotions, began to wonder how it would look from the front. He found himself getting very curious as to what a man did and said before — armed with the age, name, maternal and paternal parents' names of his bride—he came to ask for legal permission to be forever happy.

It would be very easy, of course, for Clymer Ames to get that legal right. In his capacity of lover he could approach himself in his capacity as clerk, and without unnecessary embarrassment or hesitation ask for a license and get it. To be sure, he could not well be on both sides of the window at once, and he had some doubts about the complete regularity of a license granted under circumstances in which the applicant associated with such unseemly familiarity with his superior, the clerk.

This, however, was a difficulty which he felt could be overcome. But that was the fifth act. What led up to it? What did a lover do through the four preceding acts?

Clymer Ames determined to find out.

Fate, which is sometimes kind only to be cruel, aided him. It went further, and abetted.

Lydia Eastwater lived in the next block but one to where Clymer Ames boarded, and she came down to see the daughter of the landlady and play tennis with her on the lawn. Clymer, who had hitherto detested tennis, felt convinced as soon as he saw Lydia Eastwater on the green that exercise was the only thing for him after his long office hours.

The rest of the summer he put on white flannel as soon as he got home, and he all but slept with a tennis bat in his hand.

"I guess it must be pretty dull staying in the office all day this hot weather," said Lydia Eastwater one night when they stood together on the same side of the white tennis net.

"It's dull enough. But nothing to what it used to be, you know. I have something to look forward to now."

"Have you?" said Lydia Eastwater innocently, picking a bug off her red and white skirt. "I'm sure I'm glad of it."

"It's the tennis at night I look forward to. It brightens up my whole day. Don't you care for it, too?"

"Me?" ejaculated Lydia with ungrammatical nonchalance. "Oh, yes, I like tennis well enough. I wish, though, that these people would come back and go to playing. Standing around on a tennis ground till you are ready to drop isn't any pleasanter than standing around anywhere else."

She flirted out one foot as she talked and revealed a marvelous stocking. Clymer wondered if the twenty-two fellows who had that day applied to him for the sanction of the law to their bliss had experienced such difficulties in the first act—he felt himself to be nearing the end of that part of the drama.

If Lydia Eastwater would only show by some sign, however slight, that her heart throbbed as his did he would be willing to have the curtain rung down for the entre'act and let the orchestra play a while.

"It is not because I play tennis that I am happy," he cried explosively, "but because I play tennis with you."

"Oh," cried Miss Eastwater, as she retied the yellow bow on her hat, "isn't it too bad then that I am going away tomorrow for the rest of the summer?"

Going for the rest of the summer! Clymer was sure none of those twenty-two happy men with licenses in their pockets had ever known such suffering as this. He leaned against a tree. He could not remember feeling so strange since that day he fainted in the office, after being up all night with the poor agent who had the rheumatic fever.

"Then you are not sorry to go?" he whispered. "You will not miss me?"

Lydia Eastwater tied the yellow bow once more. It was growing into a deeper twilight. The one bar of red in the west was all there was left of the day. She hit a moth that fluttered by in the dusk.

"Why, yes, I shall care. I shall care very much indeed." She looked straight at him, and the red in the west got into her cheeks. Clymer started forward, throbbing with a new life. He forgot all about the first act and even about the fifth one. All he saw was a girl's eyes. All he felt was her soft lips.

Then the other players came walking across the lawn in the twilight, and the next day Miss Eastwater went away.

Clymer wrote to her, of course. He stole the time in which to do this from the county. But the answers were not just what he had expected they would be.

They were full of pleasant gossiping and even of the expression of those girlish opinions which most young maidens hold, and which so strongly resemble copybook mottoes. But she said very little of just the sort of thing that Clymer desired her to say. He consoled himself by looking at every applicant for a license who thrust his face in at the little window and reflecting:

"Ah! my man, you look happy now. But I know what you have been through! You may not believe it, but I myself have experienced the rapture of a fitting close to the first act, and am now in the midst of the perplexities which are so necessary to the progress of the play. My dear fellow, take this filled-out blank with my blessing. It looks very common-place, perhaps, to the uninitiated. But you and I are perfectly aware that it is the passport to heaven."

None of these remarks were audible, of course. They were the combined soliloquies of Clymer the lover and Clymer the clerk. The man who supplied the office with legal blanks stood aghast at this time at the number consumed in what was technically known as Cupid's department.

They seemed so remarkably in excess of the number of applications recorded that the night clerk might, with some show of justice, have been accused of throwing them into the waste basket.

And it is true that they did go there, but not until a deal of labor had been expended upon them, not until the blank spaces revealed the fact that Clymer Ames, who lived in a certain city, township, county and State, and who was of such and such an age, and without legal hindrance or incumbrance of a marital sort, received herewith permission from the clerk to marry Miss Lydia Eastwater, whose qualifications were then set down.

One day a stranger entered the office—a fine fellow, with a elision of the "r" and a swing in the gait.

"Man of importance, of property, of temper and enthusiasm," said the clerk to himself after his usual manner of summing up his customers.

"I want a marriage license," said the young man gayly and peremptorily.

"Name," said the clerk, trying to be perfunctory, but actually throbbing with sympathy with this happy young animal.

"Alfred Sidney Johnson Clayton."

"Name of lady?"

"Lydia Ernestine Eastwater."

The clerk went on filling out the rest of the blank, and did not move a muscle. The lover—but there was no lover except the young man who went out swinging his shoulders as he went.

And so the peace of Cupid's servitor became, as was mentioned at first, like a batch of bread made from stale yeast. And though he works for love, he and his clerk do not speak when they meet, and the capricious boy has even been seen to fold his wings closer about him with an air of contempt when he looked at Clymer Ames, clerk of the court and issuer of marriage licenses. —Omaha World-Herald.

Freed a Wildcat.

A San Franciscan who had been hunting in the vicinity of Lake Tahoe without bagging any game came upon a mountaineer who was feeding a caged wildcat he had caught the day before. "How much will you take for that beast?" he asked. The captor said $20, and the money was paid over. "Now," said the Nimrod, "tie one end of a strong cord to that tree and another to the cat's neck, and then open the door of the cage." This was finally accomplished, and the fierce animal stood straining at its tether. The sportsman, who was watching the exercises from the interior of the cabin, leveled his rifle across the window sill, took careful aim and blazed away. The wildcat gave a joyful yell and disappeared into the forest. The bullet had cut the rope!

Effect of Advertising.

A Butte (Mont.) merchant who advertised a bankrupt stock of shoes was totally unprepared for the enormous crowd which filled his store. Twelve clerks were utterly inadequate to wait upon the rush of customers. Several women fainted in the crush, and finally the doors had to be locked. The merchant now believes in advertising.

"PACKING A GUN."

That Means Carrying a Pistol—A Habit Falling Into Commendable Disuse.

West of the Missouri River the constitutional privilege of bearing arms is universally translated into the vernacular as "packing a gun." By no chance does the gun-packer ever refer to a pistol as a pistol. To him the weapon is always a gun, whether it be the usual 45-caliber or the old style Allen pepper box, or even the 32-caliber, which originated the remark of the Texan that if he were ever shot with one of those things and found it out there would be trouble.

But whether one may prefer the frontiersman's term or some more elegant form of expression, the chief feature of interest to be noted is that the habit of carrying a pistol is falling into disuse. It is not many years ago that everyone, especially on the Pacific Coast, would as soon have thought of starting on a journey without a tooth brush or a pocket flask or any other article of necessity as without a pistol, whereas now if a thorough search were made of the passengers in a railway train not more than one in twenty at the very outside would be found to be armed.

There are several reasons for the custom of "packing a gun" having fallen into desuetude. One is the ordinary uselessness of the weapon. If a train or stage is held up, every advantage lies with the robbers so far as the passengers are concerned.

The assailants are ready, while the passengers are not, and they do say that the view down the muzzle of a full-sized six-shooter in the hands of a masked or disguised robber is an experience which no one ever forgets who has been through it. One of the best-known detectives of the State alighted from a stage coach in Arizona, stood up in line, and even allowed two handsome revolvers to be taken from his pockets because the stage robbers "had the drop" on him, and he knew it.

A second reason for not carrying a pistol is the discomfort and inconvenience of it. If it is carried in the hip pocket, as is not unusual, it drags down all the time, and is a decided nuisance when the wearer sits down. If the pistol be carried in a holster the belt slips and works around until the pistol gets into some position which makes its possessor decidedly uncomfortable, and there it manifests a disposition to stay.

Still another reason is the danger which a pistol causes, especially if it be unloaded. It has been calculated that about 59.9 per cent of all the fatal accidents from pistols come from weapons which everybody is sure are unloaded, and probably half of all the rest come from the careless or ignorant use of the weapon, or from some desire to be smart and show off with it. Unfortunately it is not the pistol wielder who is hurt generally, but some innocent and unlucky bystander, or some child who has not been able to recognize the genus stultus from a single specimen.

It is quite time that the custom of carrying weapons should pass into oblivion entirely among civilized people, unless under very exceptional circumstances. During an epidemic of robbery, such as we had here some months ago, a pistol might possibly be useful, though to walk in the middle of the street and blow a police whistle at any suspicion of danger, at the same time taking to one's heels, is generally much more effective. We have outgrown the times when every dispute, however trivial, was settled by an appeal to arms, and those times can never be restored. In the present conditions of life in the United States, even in so barbarous a country as the East fancies California to be, packing a gun is, as a rule, a pure affectation which would better be dispensed with. —San Francisco Chronicle.

Bursting of a Glacial Dam.

In the Australian Tyrol is a well-known glacier several miles long and about 1,200 feet thick. On its way down the mountain it runs right across a valley. Water trickles into this valley above the glacier, which for years has been a barrier in the way of collecting streams, so they formed a lake high up in the mountain 1,000 feet long, about 350 feet wide, and fully eighty feet deep.

About the middle of June the streams which fed this lake rose until its waters began to flow over the top of the glacier, and the stream flowing over its surface rapidly cut into the ice. Finally the top of the glacier gave way entirely, and the waters of the lake were suddenly precipitated down the valley. Comparatively little water had been flowing through the valley before, but it now became the bed of a roaring torrent.

It was fortunate that not a single village lay along the bottom of the valley in its upper part, for had there been a village there it would have been destroyed. A few houses, however, were carried away, but the inhabitants had feared for two or three days the bursting of the glacial dam, and had prudently removed further down the valley with their cattle. When the water reached the villages it had spread over so great a width and had so largely diminished in force, that no serious damage was done, though, of course, the sudden flood was the cause of a great deal of discomfort and inconvenience. All the dikes and roads were flooded, and the paths in the upper part of the valley were entirely destroyed and covered with debris.

Patents.

The average number of American patents issued yearly is about 20,000. England, which comes nearest to us, issues only about 4,000 to 5,000 a year, and its system is very much more lax than ours. Patents are issued without any conditions as to novelty or merits, and not two applications in one hundred are rejected. In Prussia the number granted annually is less than 100; in Belgium, 1,500 to 2,000.

THE CZAR'S SHOT-PROOF CAR.

How the Emperor of Russia Travels Among His Loving Subjects.

When the Czar travels in Russia the precautions taken for his safety could not be greater were he in the enemy's country. A battalion of infantry is detailed for every two miles of distance, and allowing 500 men as the strength of each batallion, every spot of ground on both sides of the track is covered by sentinels within easy distance of each other. The Czar is suddenly whirled off to the station, accompanied by the chosen twelve of his body guard, without pomp or circumstance, swiftly and silently. The Czar always travels in a train of five carriages. His carriage is built in a peculiar way.

The windows, while ample for light, are high, so that a person sitting down is invisible from the outside, and the sides of the car are fortified with plates of steel concealed in the ornamental woodwork, but amply strong to resist a bullet. There are two sentry boxes in the carriage, one at each end, and each looking out at an opposite side from the other. The guardsmen on duty in these apartments are shut off from any observation of the interior of the carriage, but at intervals of about two feet the whole length of the saloon there are electric buttons communicating with the guard chambers, as well as with the two carriages, one containing the suite and the other, in the rear, occupied by the guardsmen not on duty. So far as the train itself is concerned, the Czar could be no more secure in St. Petersburg.

The train speeds on to its destination without a halt, except on account of accident. At a distance of not less than five miles ahead is a pioneer train in which the Imperial Director of Railways and the chief engineer of the particular railway on which the Czar is traveling always ride. As the pilot train whizzes by the reserves along the line rush to arms and guard the sides of the railway, waiting until the imperial train has passed, so that the spectacle is presented of continuous lines of soldiery for hundreds of miles. Arrived at the end of his journey, the Czar is escorted to the quarters intended for the imperial family.

The streets are guarded by special constables in the attire of citizens. Every property owner has been called upon to supply one or more of these men at his own expense to do duty when the sovereign makes a public appearance. The constables average one in ten of the crowd that throng the streets, and being in ordinary dress, they can mingle with the people, note what is said, and, perhaps, do something that will obtain them regular employment among the secret police. With one-tenth the population engaged as spies upon the remainder, with troops enough concentrated to stand a formidable siege, and his faithful guardsmen dogging every step the Czar goes through the forms of a visit to the ancient capital of Russia, or whatever city he may choose to honor.—Philadelphia Telegraph.

VEGETABLE CURIOSITY.

A Plant Out in California That Produces Hard-Boiled Eggs.

Among the many curious things in the plant world, says the San Francisco Examiner, such as flowers that eat flies, the Holy Ghost plant, that bears a white dove in its petals, and others equally interesting, there is none more curious than the solanum gatratrum, a recent addition to Golden Gate park conservatory.

This plant bears hard-boiled eggs for fruit. At least, the fruit resembles a hard-boiled egg, with the shell taken off, as nearly as a truly egg can.

There are three eggs on the park plant—one as large as a pigeon's egg, another the size of a turkey's product, and the third is about 5 1-2 inches long by 2 1-2 wide. In color they are identical to the bluish white of the cooked article of hen production. The laying plant was the great object of attraction in the conservatory yesterday, and groups of people stood before it all day, wondering what it was and whether the fruit was good to eat.

The blossom is small, of a rich purple hue, and when the flower drops off a little white egg is seen. This grows to about the size of its cousin, the pear-shaped egg plant of commerce. But the white variety preserves the perfect egg-shape in all stages of its development.

It thrives in the open air wherever the purple plant grows, and is cultivated in the same way. Another variety of the same family bears a golden yellow fruit, but the white variety is the only one in which the fruit is of the ovoid form.

When pressed between the fingers the white fruit is found to possess the same soft, elastic feeling as a hard-boiled egg. The interior is filled with cells and small seeds, like the purple plant of the tomato.

Aside from its utility as an article of food it is prized for its rarity and beauty. The plant stands about two feet high, and has broad, soft, oval leaves of dark green.

Intoxicated Birds.

A pigeon-flying experiment at Tours, France, has ended in a most remarkable manner, proving the shocking fact that the useful birds, in addition to being excessively greedy, are also given to an overindulgence in strong drinks. Four hundred and twenty-nine pigeons were conveyed by train from Tours to La Bohalle, and there let loose. To the astonishment of the various societies interested in the experiment only forty returned home, and these were in a dazed condition and quite incapable of finding their respective quarters. An inquiry resulted in the discovery that at a roadside station a large consignment of black currants had been put in the same van as the birds. The inebriating qualities of the currants' juice proved too much for the little travelers, and they were quickly in such a condition that only a small proportion were sober enough to find their way back to Tours.—London Times.

BREAD OUT OF SAWDUST.

Scientists Now at Work on the Problem and May Solve It.

A Washington Star reporter was informed that the department of agriculture is interested in a plan for making bread out of sawdust.

Absurd? By no means. Scientists believe that there is no good reason why the thing should not be entirely practicable. Everybody knows that starch is a substance extremely nutritious; in fact, it is nearly all nutriment. Well, starch and sawdust are the same thing. Sawdust, which is "cellulose," is of precisely the same chemical composition as starch. The two are expressed by the chemical formula—$C_6 H_{10} O_5$—that is, six parts of carbon, ten of hydrogen, and five parts of oxygen. These are the simple ingredients of either starch or sawdust. Scientific experimenters have been trying for a long time to find out a way to transform the one into the other. If they should succeed the discovery would be away ahead of the philosopher's stone in point of value. An inexhaustible source of food supply would at once be rendered available in the forests, the grass, and even in straw and chaff.

Hitherto chemistry has occupied itself almost wholly with taking things apart, in order to find out what they are made of; but now the science is directing its attention to putting elements together for the production of useful substances. Already it has succeeded in the artificial preparation of indigo, alizarin, uric acid, and many other compounds. The aniline colors, obtained from coal tar and yet rivaling the most brilliant tints of the rainbow, are similarly produced. So complex are some of them that their names, which give full accounts of their composition, have to be regular seven-league words, one beautiful dye being known as "Hexamethyimethoxytriamidotriphenyicarbinol." From coal tar in a like manner are derived many valuable anti-fever medicines and soporifics.

The prospects of this new science of putting elements together seem infinite, and the era of bliss may yet dawn which has been prophesied by the illustrious naturalist Frederick Cohn, who says that all struggles for existence among men arising from want of food will be done away with, when chemistry shall have learned to make starch from carbolic acid and water. Plants grow by doing just that, and it may, therefore, be said that farmers have been engaged since time immemorial in this very chemical industry. It would scarcely be so surprising, then, if the farms of the country should be replaced at some time in the future by chemical laboratories.

How Four Indian Wars Began.

The Modoc War of 1872, in which so many valuable lives were lost, was begun by the advance of a half a troop of the 1st Cavalry. This force rode up to the Indian camp, dismounted, and were standing to horse, with probably no thought of being murdered or of any serious trouble. It is reported that while the officers in command was talking to the chief a rifle was discharged by an Indian, either accidentally or as a signal, and that instantly thereafter firing on the troops took place and a number were killed and wounded. The Indians, about sixty in number, taking advantage of the confusion among the troops, retired to their stronghold in the lava beds, murdering every white man en route. In this stronghold they defied the Government, massacred a commission composed of prominent men sent to them in peace, and withstood the attack of 1300 soldiers for months, and until both food and water gave out.

The Nez Perces War in 1877 commenced in about the same way. Two small troops of cavalry, marching down a deep and long canon, presented themselves before the camp of Chief Joseph, as if a display of this nature was all that was necessary to capture a force of two hundred and fifty warriors. The Indians, always quick to see an advantage and to profit by it, were not slow in this instance, and the first few shots from the enemy on the left and rear of the line caused a hasty retreat of the soldiers, who no doubt up to that time thought there was to be nothing serious.

The Little Big Horn fight in 1876, where General Custer and most of his command were massacred, was surely the result of overestimating one's strength and underrating that of the enemy.

Other examples could be furnished, but are not these, with their attendant losses and failures, sufficient to prove that with the Indian as a foe we must always be prepared, and especially careful when he seems most friendly and still holds on to his rifle? On the other hand, many instances are known where the troops have met and overcome at the start more serious obstacles than those mentioned above, and without a shot being fired. A column on the march, prepared to fight if necessary, is not likely to be disturbed, and it is almost certain that no Indians will be seen or heard from unless they have all the advantages, and unless certainty of success follows their first efforts.

This Ute campaign was a repetition of all the other sad occurrences in Indian warfare. Major Thornburgh, the commander, as noble and brave a man as ever marched with troops, fell as others had, having ignored an enemy in the morning who had the power to defeat him before noon. The march through these mountains and into the valley of Milk River, as described, was made as any march would be conducted on a turnpike through a civilized country and among friends. No danger had threatened; on the contrary, Indians appeared friendly, and assuring messages had been received from the agent.—Col. E. V. Summer, in the Century.

HIS SECOND CAMPAIGN
BY MAURICE THOMPSON
COPYRIGHTED BY AMERICAN PRESS ASSOCIATION 1891

I was at Jessup that night."

There was such a ring of surprised and injured innocence—such a reproach in his voice—that she felt her heart shrink and flutter.

"If you are innocent—if I have wronged you—forgive me!" she exclaimed. She rose as she spoke, and for a moment stood before him in a faltering attitude. "It may all be cleared up some time. I cannot see you any more until it is. I hope you are innocent, but, but—I—I believe you are guilty."

He sprang up. The pallor in his face was awful. His eyes shot clear flames. His cheeks and forehead seemed to shrivel.

"It is a lie! a damned infernal lie! I will not bear it!" His lips were flecked with froth. "And this from you, Rosalie!" he cried, "from you whom I love more than all the world! My God, can you believe this? If all the world were marshaled against me to believe a lie, I would turn to you for"—

"Hush!" she said, almost sternly; and yet the regretful gentleness broke through her voice. "Hush! If you are innocent time will prove it. Go back to Savannah and solve this mystery. Go back and find the true murderer or would be murderer of Colonel Warren Talbot, and then I will hear of your friendship, and not till then!"

Her words seemed to have the power to spin him away to an infinite distance from her. He recoiled as if she had stabbed him. For a moment he hesitated, then in a dry, strange voice he said:

"If the villain who struck Colonel Talbot is above ground I will find him." He turned about as he finished speaking, and strode away through the woods.

"Mr Ellis!" Rosalie called out after him.

He stopped and looked back. She hesitated. She hardly knew what she wanted to say to him.

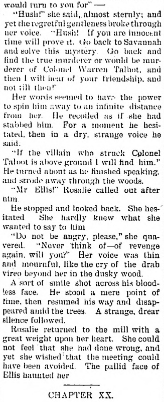
"Do not be angry, please," she quavered. "Never think of—of revenge again, will you?" Her voice was thin and mournful, like the cry of the drab vireo beyond her in the dusky wood.

A sort of smile shot across his bloodless face. He stood a mere point of time, then resumed his way and disappeared amid the trees. A strange, drear silence followed.

Rosalie returned to the mill with a great weight upon her heart. She could not feel that she had done wrong, and yet she wished that the meeting could have been avoided. The pallid face of Ellis haunted her

CHAPTER XX.

AT LOVE'S GATE.



They talked over all their past lives.

Mrs. Roosevelt felt the need of hastening the departure from the "pocket," but notwithstanding her efforts it was toward the middle of February when everything was ready. There had been many things to do. Colonel Chenier's library, so rich in mediæval poetry and romance, was sent away in large boxes to Savannah. Rosalie assisted in the packing and peeped into the old French tomes and manuscript rolls with something like her former relish. It seemed to her that every one of these contained some half suppressed allusion to the land of her dreams. No doubt it was quite natural for her thus to cheat herself, for all the old romances were full of chateaux and olive groves and vineyards, where knights rode in pleasant lanes beside their lady loves, or played the lute under the walls by moonlight, or galloped away to the wars with a warm kiss tingling on their bearded lips. And had not her father been reading these to her from her childhood, and telling her about Chateau Chenier and her knightly ancestors who dwelt in the land of the mistral and the troubadour?

What vivid pictures, too, the strong descriptive talks of Edgar Julian had given her of those crumbling walls, those fervid skies and those orchard crowned, breezy hills! Her visions were none the less fair and enticing seen through the haze of her sorrow

She did not go to the spring any more, for though she felt sure that Ellis had gone away, she shrank from seeing even the spot where she had witnessed his awful passion.

When the time at last came for going back to Savannah, it was not with any well defined regret that she bade farewell to the mill and the little crisp valley. Adelaide seemed much affected, and quietly wept all the way over the mountain. Colonel Chenier suffered too, but he sternly controlled himself, even calmly talking with Aunt Marguerite as the carriage bore them through the devious way among the hills and gray-green groves of oaks and pines.

The Roosevelt mansion had grown to be Rosalie's home, and she was like a child just returned from a long journey when she again found herself in her stately and spacious room. Adelaide was quiet and sad, but Colonel Chenier, taken unawares by Mr. Roosevelt's cordial friendliness and hospitality, was tempted out of his gloom. He was naturally a companionable man, generous and courteous, and it required very little to draw out all his latent good qualities. He and Mr. Roosevelt met as though nothing disagreeable had ever existed between them; they talked over all their past lives, saving that they quietly ignored that unfortunate quarrel.

One thing curiously affected Rosalie. It was the absence of Edgar Julian. She had expected to find him at Roosevelt Place, and she had counted much on the pleasure his descriptions of Provence and Chateau Chenier would give her father. To find that he was gone was a real blow to her

"He would not stay any longer," said Mr. Roosevelt as they all sat at dinner; "I tried to prevail on him to make his home in Savannah, offered him a big salary, with leave to do general practice besides, but he seemed to have grown homesick or tired of the south. He got into a difficulty with young Ellis, too, and that made him miserable."

Rosalie asked no questions—she did not care to hear further, but Mildred Fain told her all the particulars when they met. Poor Mildred! she looked like a shadow. The physicians were still hanging over Colonel Talbot, and still declaring his recovery quite possible, though as yet he had not regained consciousness. Rosalie felt herself in some sort to blame for all the suffering of Colonel Talbot and Miss Fain, and keeping the secret of that moonlight walk inclosed in her breast had generated a sense of guilt which gnawed at her conscience.

"If Colonel Talbot dies," she sometimes thought, "I shall be accessory to his murder—if not in purpose, still in fact."

It rendered her extremely wretched to hear Miss Fain talk, for although she rarely mentioned her lover directly, all her thoughts tended toward him, and she evidently bore all his sufferings with him.

The newspapers announced that Ellis had returned to Savannah, but Rosalie saw nothing of him. Sometimes she found herself wondering if it could be that he was innocent of the crime of which she had accused him. Such a thing was not impossible, and yet she felt sure that she could not have been mistaken in recognizing him as he followed her and Talbot, like a sinister shadow, on that lovely and never-to-be-forgotten night.

One day, about a week after her return to Roosevelt Place, Rosalie was sitting at her window reading in one of her father's favorite romances, or rather she had been reading and was now idly gazing into the street below, when a carriage rolled slowly by. A servant in livery was driving. Inside were a noble looking middle aged man, a fair, plump, lovely girl, and Frank Ellis. She had seen this man once before, and knew he was Sir Edmond Kane; the young lady, as she rightly supposed, was Miss Ellen, Sir Edmond's daughter. Ellis seemed quite happy, as did also the others, their faces smiling, their conversation apparently animated and free. The English girl was charmingly dressed, and her face, though not beautiful, was high bred and fascinating, and her form was superb

A strange feeling crept over Rosalie as she looked down upon this passing group. It was like a breath of exquisite sorrow or regret; her heart seemed to fall low in her breast and flutter painfully. Some sweet thing her fancy had been nursing slipped away from her. Ellis turned his eyes toward the house. She retreated from the window for fear he might see her; then she sank into a chair and cried, she knew not why. Life seemed to her to be growing hollow and meaningless; its zest had slipped away, like a perfume from a withering flower. She began to be restless and impatient for the time to come round when she and her father, with Aunt Marguerite and Adelaide, would go across the sea, but the thought of the journey pleased her more on account of the distance it would give than for any joy which it promised at its end. So the days slipped past, until at last a letter came to her from Edgar Julian.

"I did not get to say goodby to you," he wrote, "therefore I take the liberty to write this instead. I lingered along the road homeward among the battlefields of Georgia and Tennessee, but I found no pleasure in what I saw. I seemed to miss something which would have made even the brown hills charming. When I crossed the Ohio river I met a great snowstorm, sent down from Chicago to welcome me, and quite soon the ground was covered a foot deep with the white fleece of winter. Here the streets are all ice and snowbanks, and as I write the wind is blue with cold and is howling like a pack of hungry wolves. I am dissatisfied and wish I were back in Savannah, on your uncle's wide veranda, with the salt air blowing over me and the palm trees rustling their spreading fans hard by. I don't believe I am a northern man any longer: the worry and hurry of Chicago does not satisfy my especial hunger. May I come back? I think I could be less trouble to all you hospitable and patient southerners now; this great distance has brought out in strong relief all my faults and all your goodness. How infinitely warm and comforting, how perfumed and luxuriant, how breezy, how shady, how inviting is the whole south, now that I have left it!

"I have the hot air register wide open in my room and a big coal fire on the hearth, and yet I am freezing! Won't you and Mrs. Roosevelt please invite me to come back? I could run on errands for you, and make myself reasonably useful, and I would try and not be much in the way.

"I heard Gerster sing last night, and Litta the night before, but I would rather be in that dim old parlor in Roosevelt Place and hear 'La Mandore;' my spirit is there now—do you not often hear it rustling around in its favorite places? I stopped at Calhoun and Resaca as I came home, and while there I inquired for the Chenier mill, and found it was only thirty miles distant. The temptation to visit it was very great, but I resisted. I always do resist at the wrong time.

"Frankly, I want to say that I am unfit for business since returning, and I think of nothing but how I shall get back to Savannah without offending my own sense of the fitness of things. I have been worse since seeing in a Savannah paper yesterday a notice in the personal column of your return to Roosevelt Place. True, the paper was two weeks old when I got it, but it had its effect all the same.

"You will not be offended if I say that I find life a burden where you are not to be seen and heard. I want to talk with you and hear you sing. I have thought, since I came here, of a hundred things I forgot to tell you about Provence and Chateau Chenier, and I have wondered how I passed so much time with you and said so little. What did we ever talk about? I remember nothing, save our last conversation, and even that had no end—it was left in a mist. I told you I loved you, but I did not and could not tell you how deep and strong that love was, how it had become the very life of my life. My lips refused then, as my pen does now, to express how dear you are to me. Forgive me if this letter seems foolish to you. I cannot see my As he went over again his boyish freak in the army she saw him more as a boy soldier than as a man, and he had a curiously familiar look.

A few northern tourists were abroad in the park, sauntering up and down the shaded walks and dallying around the flower decked fountain. Some mocking birds were singing ecstatically in the treetops overhead.

Suddenly, without any definite forewarning, by one of those inexplicable cerebral tricks, Adelaide recognized Julian as that daring, devilish soldier lad who stabbed her with a bayonet and burned her father's mansion.

The knowledge came upon her as the apparition of death or some numbing calamity. The blood went out of her face, and she grew weak, trembled, drew her breath heavily, and clutched the back of the bench for support.

Julian instantly became aware of this change. He was startled

"You are ill," he exclaimed; "what is it? I will call a carriage."

"No, no," she said faintly; "in a moment it will be over. It is a mere faintness. Do not be alarmed."

She struggled bravely and conquered more than he dreamed of. Presently she smiled and added:

"It has passed already; it was quite sudden. Let us return, if you please."

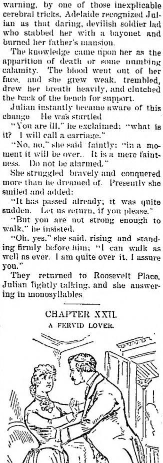
"But you are not strong enough to walk," he insisted.

"Oh, yes," she said, rising and standing firmly before him; "I can walk as well as ever. I am quite over it, I assure you."

They returned to Roosevelt Place, Julian lightly talking, and she answering in monosyllables.

CHAPTER XXII.

A FERVID LOVER.



"You must not!" she said.

Nearly all the remarkable traits of southern character, good and bad, had rounded to full ripeness in Francis Whitcombe Ellis. He had the gift of oratory the luxuriant, untrained imagination, the fierce love of fight, the ambition for wealth, the mediæval notion of honor, no regard whatever for truth in the abstract, a perfect faith in the purity of women, an absolute punctuality in keeping his word simply on the score of conventional honor, and a reverence for everything pertaining to southern aristocracy, only equaled by his hatred of everything northern and his high disdain of manual labor and all forms of mere breadgetting effort. To balance these characteristics, he was generous, brave, courteous to those whom he liked, tender hearted, full of warm sympathies and laudable impulses, charmingly companionable, and possessed of the gift called "magnetism," by which he had made his way to his present wealth and power in an incredibly short space of time. He had been aided at every step by good luck, as such men seem always to be, as well as by the fine intuition of a born genius, if the mere power to control and combine may be called genius.

He loved Rosalie Chenier with a passion like intensified fire whenever he thought of her but once his thoughts turned from her, he did not love her at all. He was not fickle. He simply lacked the power to think of two things at once. He focused his whole mind and soul upon whatever for the time occupied his attention.

Rosalie's direct accusation against him had stung his southern sense of honor almost to the point of driving him mad for the time. He had straightway rushed back to Savannah, bent upon making plain his innocence. That she should think him guilty of a vulgar assassination was more than he could bear. For awhile his mental torture was exquisite. He went to work with enormous energy trying to ferret out the real assassin. If only Colonel Talbot could speak he might easily settle the whole matter with a word, but Colonel Talbot could not speak; he lay there dumb and unconscious, a puzzle to the learned physicians.

When Rosalie returned to Savannah from the "pocket" Ellis knew it, but he did not attempt to see her; he meant never to speak to her again until his innocence had been proven beyond a doubt. He admitted to himself that, in a way, he deserved this punishment, remembering distinctly as he did his foolish threatening words. But he had a large faith in the star of his destiny—that is, in his luck, and he spared no effort to get into the mystery of that unhappy night.

After a time Sir Edmond Kane came back to Savannah for a few days, and Ellis was flattered by the marked attention paid him by the English aristocrat and his fair daughter. His thoughts were turned from Rosalie and his investigation of the crime, and he gave Miss Ellen Kane his undivided attention. The English girl found him a charming companion—so attentive, so knightly, so full of ready expedients for rational amusement, and withal, so delightful as a story teller. Those days made a memorable spot in Miss Kane's life. She went back to England dimly conscious that she had almost loved an American. As for way to any better mode of [illegible] this simple statement of the truth. I trust you to respect my sincerity, even if you must cast aside my love as some thing not worth your keeping."

Rosalie read this in her own room, read it and reread it, with a quickened pulse and a sweet sense of its half hopeful, half despairing spirit. It brought Edgar Julian before her, just as she had seen him last; his strong, handsome, truthful face full of passionate tenderness for her. She could not think clearly; her heart throbbed almost painfully. Adelaide came in presently and Rosalie gave her the letter to read.

"Do you love him, Rosalie?" the sister asked after she had finished.

"I—I—don't know," was the stammered reply.

"I think you ought to know," said Adelaide; "love is no light thing. Is he handsome?"

"No, not very—not handsome as they describe handsome men; but he is tall and strong and noble looking, and he is noble, great hearted, true."

"I believe you love him," said Adelaide, gazing searchingly into Rosalie's eyes, "and I am sorry of it."

Rosalie did not answer. Her beautiful bright head drooped and her eyes filled with tears

"I do not see how you can love a northerner," Adelaide continued; "especially one who was in Sherman's army. Whenever I think of those ruffians who burned our home and reduced us to poverty, the gash in my arm seems to open afresh and I hate every soul in the north! Then poor papa with his wounds and his disfigurements"——

"Oh," moaned Rosalie, "I know, I know! Oh, I wish I had never, never left the 'pocket,' Adelaide, I am so very very wretched!"

Adelaide took Rosalie's head between her hands and drew it gently down upon her bosom. She knew what love was. A soldier's grave held one to whom her life had been pledged.

"Don't cry," she gently said; "if you love him it's all right, dear. It was wrong for me to say these things. It's all right; you mustn't mind my ill natured words. You ought not to suffer on my account. No doubt Mr. Julian is a good and true man."

"Yes, he is," said Rosalie quickly, lifting her head and wiping away her tears; "he is just as honorable and good as he can be."

Adelaide still kept her hands clasping Rosalie's face between them with a gentle, loving pressure.

"But you do love him, sister?" she murmured softly.

Rosalie suddenly blushed. "I do not know if I love him," she naively said, "but I should dearly love to see him again. I—I think a great deal of him."

Adelaide felt the influence of her sister's freshness as she faltered trembling and bewildered in the midst of this great new experience.

CHAPTER XXI.

ADELAIDE RECOLLECTS.

Rosalie found it difficult to know what she ought to write to Edgar Julian, if she ought to write at all. He had been so kind to her, and she respected his honorable frankness so much, that, even if she could not say she loved him, she felt generously anxious not to wound him. But she really longed to see him. He had filled a large space in her life, and had revealed to her a most interesting contrast as his ultra northern traits of character struck sharply against southern obstacles; not that she had traced and defined this contrast or drawn any conclusion from it, but she had felt his superior knowledge of affairs, his sturdy truthfulness, his faith in the future of America, his belief in the value and nobleness of labor, his genuine respect for the common people, and, on the other hand, his rich imagination and his tender eloquence. She could not realize the bitter memories nursed by her father and sister touching the dark

Mortgage Foreclosure Sale.

Default having been made in the payment of the money secured by a certain mortgage, duly executed and delivered by Silvester Johnson and Julia Johnson, his wife, of Polk county, Minnesota, mortgagors, to Francis W. Noyes, mortgagee, bearing date the 7th day of July 1882, and, with a power of sale therein contained duly recorded in the office of the register of deeds in and for the county of Polk and state of Minnesota, on the 8th day of July, 1882, at 11:10 o'clock a. m. in book F of mortgages on pages 562 to 565 and no action or proceeding having been instituted, at law or otherwise, to recover the debt secured by said mortgage, or any part thereof. The amount claimed to be due on said mortgage at the date hereof is the sum of four hundred and ninety seven dollars ($497) besides the sum of one hundred thirteen and 11-100 dollars for taxes necessarily paid by said mortgagee and interest, and twenty five dollars, attorney's fees stipulated for in said mortgage.

Now, therefore, notice is hereby given, that the said mortgage will be foreclosed by a sale of the premises described in said mortgage, viz:

The east half of the southeast quarter and the east half of the north east quarter of section number thirty two in township No. one hundred and forty nine north of range forty-five west, and containing one hundred and sixty acres of land more or less, according to the government survey thereof in Polk county, and state of Minnesota, which sale will be made by the sheriff of said Polk county, or his deputy, at the front door of the court house, in the city of Crookston in said county and state, on the 28th day of November, 1891, at 2 o'clock p.m., of that day.

Dated October 1st, A. D. 1891.

Mortgage Sale.—Default having been made in the payment of the sum of fourteen hundred twenty-five and 33-100 dollars, ($1425.33) which is claimed to be due at the date of this notice upon a certain mortgage, duly executed and delivered by Thomas Perusse and Delima Perusse, his wife, to Josephine Majeau, bearing date the 23 day of June, A. D. 1886, and, with a power of sale therein contained, duly recorded in the office of the register of deeds in and for the county of Polk and State of Minnesota, on the 18th day June, A. D. 1886, at 8:00 o'clock a. m., in book T of mortgages, on page 224 therein, and no action or proceeding having been instituted, at law or otherwise, to recover the debt secured by said mortgage, or any part thereof, Now,

Therefore, notice is hereby given, that by virtue of the power of sale contained in said mortgage, and pursuant to the statute in such case made and provided, the said mortgage will be foreclosed by a sale of the premises described in and conveyed by said mortgage, viz:

The northwest quarter of section three in township one hundred and fifty north, of range forty three west in Polk county and state of Minnesota, with the hereditaments and appurtenances; which sale will be made by the sheriff of said Polk county, at the front door of the court house, in the city of Crookston in said county and state, on the 14th day of November, A. D. 1891, at 10 o'clock a. m. of that day, at public vendue, to the highest bidder for cash, to pay said debt and interest, and the taxes, if any, on said premises, and fifty dollars, attorney's fees, as stipulated in and by said mortgage in case of foreclosure, and the disbursements allowed by law; subject to redemption at any time within one year from the day of sale, as provided by law.

The program will be much on the same order as usual, with varied amusements, including a concert and drama to be given in French. The popular election contests will be a prominent feature, as follows: Contest for an upholstered rocker between Mesdames Alphonse Berthiaume and Luck Dubue; for a goldheaded cane between Joseph Fortier and Frank Sauve; for a gold watch between Henry Brosseau and Alphoase Derrouni; for a gold chain between Miss Brule and Miss Labonti. As usual, a great many of our people take considerable interest in the fair and will attend one or more days.

Joseph Smith & Co. have a novelty. It is termed a carpet exhibitor, and designed to remove the difficulty of selecting a carpet from samples. It is a four sided mirror and the sample placed in a proper position is so reflected as to present the appearance of a large extent of carpeted surface. It is just the thing, and "carpet selecting made easy" would be a fair title of its effctiveness. Joseph Smith & Co. are agents of a wholesale house and carpets can be had of them at very close to wholesale prices.

At the meeting of the village council Monday night the railroad and right-of-way situation, which has been troubling the minds of our people for the past month, were discussed. A resolution was introduced and carried, requesting the village attorney to file a written opinion as to the power of the village to vote additional bonds, and as to the amount. This method will prove the most equitable and satisfactory way of settling the right of way difficulty, if it can be done. It is to be hoped, now, that the individual property owners will, if again called upon, act in a public spirited, reasonable manner, not foolishly expecting to reap a two-fold benefit from the advent of the road at the peril of reaping none. The council has now taken hold of the matter in the proper way, and we predict, if an election is called, there will be few dissenting votes—and we assume that, before such steps are taken, the proper authorities will see that the conditions under which the bonds are voted will be such as to assure the permanent location of the depot at least within the present city limits, or better, in a position as nearly central as would be combinable with the best common interests.

The prospective marriage of Joseph Schmitz was the foundation of an amusing incident this week, wherein two farmers figured, one having asked the other if he had heard of the approaching marriage of "Joe Smith." Improved Passenger Service.

Under the new time schedule of "the North-Western Line," C., St. P., M. & O. Ry., all passenger trains of this line make the trip between St. Paul and Chicago in less than 14 hours.

The Pullman and Wagner Vestibuled Limited, leaving St. Paul at 7:30 p. m. makes the trip to Chicago in 13½ hours and from Chicago to St. Paul in 13 hours and 25 minutes.

The Daylight Express leaving St Paul at 7:45 a. m. makes the trip to Chicago in 13 hours and 50 minutes and from Chicago to St. Paul in 13 hours and 45 minutes.

This is the only line running all its trains in less than 14 hour between St. Paul and Chicago, and while this time is quick trains don't have to run at as high speed to make their time as on other lines, because this is shorter than any other line.

In addition to these facts this is the only line by which connections are assure in Chicago with all fast line trains from Chicago to the East and South in the morning and at night.

Note.—Fares by this line are always as low as by any other.

A Perfect Success. VII

The Rev. A. Antoine of Refugio, Tex., writes: As far as I am able to judge, I think Pastor Koenig's Nerve Tonic is a perfect success for any one who has suffered from a most painful nervousness as I did. I feel like myself again after taking the Tonic.

WEST SIDE, Iowa, Oct. 4, 1890.

I was suffering from nervousness, brought on by overwork, for about three years. I could not sleep nights, I could not work, and my memory got impaired; I commenced using Pastor Koenig's Nerve Tonic, and, after giving it a trial, I feel much better, my sleep has returned, and I am every way well pleased with its effect on me.

Catullus Magee and the Musical Tree.

"There was a small boy named Catullus Magee,
Whose father lived under a musical tree
That played, when Catullus was happy and good,
Most beautiful airs at the edge of the wood.

"Whenever Catullus was naughty and bad,
The airs of the tree were both doleful and sad.
To learn his son's conduct, old Mr. Magee
Had only to list to the musical tree.

"If the tree gave a woe-begone sorrowful howl,
And they missed from the cupboard a patty of fowl,
The father would play, with a movement most free,
A birchen tattoo on Catullus Magee.

"If the tree made a moan at the noon of the day,
It meant Catullus from school was away,
And without further question, when homeward he came,
He'd find his anatomy more than aflame.

"One day, when Catullus was merry and good,
The tree played sad airs at the edge of the wood.
Awave in the odorous breezes of June,
The musical branches were all out of tune.

"Said Mr. Magee; 'Hence no musical tree
Shall make me believe what I can't plainly see.
No mere sign or symbol shall govern my acts;
If I whip you again, it shall be but on facts.

"'I have whipped you, though good, when the music was sad.'
'Yes, indeed, sir, you have,' coincided the lad.
For each thrashing apologized Mr. Magee,
And the next day he chopped down the musical tree."

'TWAS ALL A JOKE.

Lois Langford held an open letter in her small, fair hand, and read it over and over again before showing it to her brother. Then, unable to answer it herself, she went into an adjoining room, where a young man sat painting.

He looked up as she entered, and laying aside his brushes, said:

"Something you want, Lois? Ah—a letter.

"Yes," she answered, handing it to him; "I wonder if I ought to go."

We should very much like to have you come, and Rose will be at the station Saturday night, so do not disappoint her. Your loving aunt, JESSIE.

The young man read it over, then, turning to his sister again, said quickly:

"Yes, Lois, go and enjoy yourself. I declare you are looking ghostly of late," then looking to his work. Lois sat down to read her letter again.

"Saturday—do you think you can spare me, Tom? Oh, how lonesome it will be for you," she said, rising and standing behind his chair.

He looked up at her and smiled kindly.

"Never mind me, sis, I shall have my work to keep me busy. I have a great deal to do now, so perhaps when you return I will be a rich man."

"Oh, Tom, it seems hard for me to be enjoying myself and you working so hard. Yes, I'll go," and she left the room.

It was Tuesday night, and on the morrow Lois was to start on her journey. She and her brother sat together in the little parlor, she finishing some sewing and he looking over some papers and orders. After a few minutes he drew out a cabinet photograph, and handing it to his sister, said, languidly:

"Here, Lois, is something for you to treasure."

She took it and blushed. It was a photograph of a young man, whose dark, laughing eyes peered up into her own, and whose smiling face caused her to blush.

"Oh, Tom, this is the copy you were painting from! Did you finish the painting?"

"Yes, I sent it to him to-day. I should have liked it better if he had come and sat for the picture. I don't like to copy photographs. However, I think I did it well."

"It seems a hard face to paint. Was it, Tom?" she asked, holding the photograph at a distance.

"No, not very. It seems to me, Lois, that you admire that face very much. I wish you could see the original."

"So do I," she answered quickly. "Did you ever see him?"

"No, I never did. Better take the picture with you and play the part of the Prince in Cinderella—find the original," and Tom laughed merrily as Lois blushed again.

"May I have it, Tom? I must confess I like his face. It always cheers me. I'll take it with me, and if I should get lonesome and cross I'll just take a peek at this picture," and giving her brother a mischievous look she continued her work.

"All right, take it. It is no further use. I suppose you will meet the new professor out there. I heard Cousin Rose speak about a young professor," and not waiting for a reply, he went to his room, while Lois sewed on until midnight.

* * * * * * *

"So you have come, dear. Oh, what splendid times we will have. I was afraid that you'd disappoint me," and two girls embraced each other affectionately.

Lois Langford surveyed her cousin with much interest, and what she saw was a slim, girlish figure wrapped in furs, a small, baby face and a pair of large black eyes looking up into her own, and Rose Thorne admired her cousin also.

"Come, the sleigh is waiting over here," said Rose, taking her cousin's arm, and they were soon on their way home.

"I wish the professor were here," said Rose one evening, as she and Lois sat alone by the glowing fire in the drawing room.

"We should not be so quiet I fear."

Lois looked inquisitive.

"Professor Stone, I mean. He is away now—in New York, I believe. Perhaps you have met him?"

Lois shook her head.

"I will tell you something if you choose to listen?"

Lois did choose to listen, and soon learned that Professor Stone was her cousin's lover, and that they were soon to be married.

"You will meet him, dear. He is to be back this week, I believe."

Lois would be pleased to meet him.

"Have you a lover, Lois?" asked Rose, and Lois blushed and smiled.

"Not a real lover—but—but—yes, I have. I will show you his picture," and, smiling and blushing, she ran to her room to find the unknown photograph. The handsome eyes once more looked into her face and seemed to be laughing with her.

She hurried down to show it to Rose, her pretty face flushed with excitement.

What fun it would be to tell her and make her believe that this handsome man was her lover!

"Here is his picture," she said, proudly, as she handed it to her cousin.

Rose took the photograph, and holding it down where the light of the fire fell full upon it, she looked once, then grew deathly pale.

"Is this your lover, Lois?" she asked, faintly. Lois bowed her head, not noticing the awful change in her cousin's face.

"Your lover!" she repeated, then fell back in her chair, the picture falling into the glowing fire. Lois uttered a little scream and was soon by her cousin's side.

She bathed the pale face, rubbed the cold hands, and still the eyes didn't open; then growing more and more frightened, she was about to run for help, when a low moan was heard and Rose sprang up from the sofa.

"What is it, Lois?" she cried.

"You fainted, dear. Come, sit down," answered Lois, drawing her to a chair.

"Oh, yes, I remember. Lois, take me to my room; I can't stay up," and Lois, unconscious of the cause of her cousin's illness, took her to her room, then returned to the drawing-room.

The fire had nearly died away and the room was quite dark, but finding her way to a chair she sank down to think of all that had happened. She had shown the picture to Rose, and then she did not faint; it was after that, so it could not have been the picture that caused it.

Then she thought of the picture. Where was it? Rose was holding it near the fire: it must have fallen in.

She knelt down before the grate and looked anxiously among the dying embers, but saw nothing. She was about to turn away when her eyes rested on something, and, reaching it, she drew the half-burned picture from the ashes.

Nothing but one eye remained visible, and that one looked laughingly into her face.

She felt as though she had lost her best friend, and, looking sadly at the one eye, she threw it back into the fire then went to her room. She had to pass Rose's room on her way, and on reaching the door she hesitated whether to go in or not. She heard a noise as the scratching of a pen. Rose must be writing. She would go in and see that she was better at any rate. She knocked and a faint voice asked: "Who is it?"

"It is only Lois, dear."

There was a moment of silence, then the answer: "Don't come in to-night, Lois. I am better and want to see no one." And poor, innocent Lois passed on to her room.

A few days afterward Lois and her aunt were in the drawing-room alone, Rose having gone for a drive.

"You won't mind, dear, if Rose isn't home after this week, will you?" asked her aunt, looking up from her work.

"Why, auntie, is she going away?" asked Lois, quickly.

"Her aunt sent for her before you came, but she didn't care to go. Now she isn't feeling well, and wishes to go away from everybody, she says."

"Oh, no, I will not mind," answered Lois, and the subject was dropped.

The next Monday Rose bade Lois good-bye and departed.

It seemed lonesome to Lois now, but, being lively herself, she managed to stay and enjoy herself as best she could.

Spring had come again in all her loveliness, and Lois enjoyed the long walks through the woods by the side of a babbling brook, and every afternoon was spent in that way.

It was one of the warmest days in May, so taking her books she wandered off to her favorite haunt. She had a great deal to think of to-day, for while in Rose's room she found a miniature photograph of the same young man whose picture she had had.

Rose must have known him; she would write that very night and ask her. Then, after reading for awhile, she sat still and looked into the water at her own reflection.

She did not hear footsteps behind her until a voice aroused her from her reverie.

"Pardon me, but can you direct me to Mr. Thorne's residence?"

She looked up and her face flushed crimson, for there beside her stood the original of the unknown photograph.

She stammered a few words and he must have understood her, for he went on his way.

Lois gazed after him, and he looked back once at the pretty girl by the brook.

It was almost dark when she reached home, and her uncle was sitting on the veranda with some young man. As she drew near she recognized him.

"My dear, this is Professor Stone," said her uncle. She seemed to hear no more, only remembered that Professor Stone was her cousin's intended husband. The memory of the burned photograph came back and she understood why Rose had acted so strangely.

There was not so much sport in it after all. Professor Stone was also thinking. He remembered a mysterious letter he had received from his fiancee, relieving him of his engagement because she had heard of his deceit and of his loving another. It was all very strange he thought. That night Lois wrote to her cousin, explaining her joke and asking for an explanation from her. She soon received it, and as Professor Stone had asked for the same he received an explanation of the whole affair.

Lois was very silent the following days, but after she had told Professor Stone of her cousin's engagement she was not so still and lonesome, for the Professor was constantly in her company, and she soon answered Rose's letter in the same style, at the same time writing to Tom to tell him that she had found her Prince.

A WONDERFUL SURGICAL FEAT.

An Operation Which Transformed an Imbecile Into a Rational Being.

Can you think of an operation that would create a mind? Can you conceive of the meaning to humanity of a discovery that would transform a congenital imbecile into a rational being? Such an operation was the one I was privileged to see.

The patient was a child about one year old. Of good parentage and of healthy bodily growth aside from the fact that its skull was that of a new-born child, and it had hardened and solidified into that shape and size. The "soft spot" was not there, and the sutures or seams of the skull had grown fast and solid, so that the brain within was cramped and compressed by its unyielding bony covering.

The body could grow—did grow—but the poor little compressed brain, the director of the intelligent and voluntary actions of the body, was kept at its first estate. Even worse than this, its struggle with its bony cage made a pressure which caused distortion and aimless or unmeaning movement. The arm and leg turned in, in that helpless, pathetic way that tells of imbecility. In short, the baby was a physically healthy imbecile—the most pathetic object on this sad earth. Upon examination, the surgeon, a gentle, sweet-natured man, whose enthusiasm for his profession—for the relief of suffering—makes him the object of devotion of many to whom he has given life and health, and the inspirer and final appeal for many a brother practitioner, discovered what he believed to be the trouble. Led by that most uncommon of all things, common-sense, he believed that this little victim of nature's mistake might be changed from a condition far worse than death to one of comfort for itself, and to those who now looked upon it only in anguish of soul.

After explaining to the parents and the surgeons who had come to witness the wonderful experiment (for, after all, at this stage it was but an experiment based upon common-sense) that it might fail; after a modest and simple statement of his reason for undertaking so dangerous an operation, with no precedent before him; after explaining that the parents fully understood that not to try it meant hopeless idiocy, and that the trial might mean death—he began the work. I will try to tell what it was in language that is not scientific, and may seem to those accustomed to surgical terms inadequate and unlearned; but to those who are not technical medical students I believe the less technical language will be far clearer.

The child's skull was laid bare in front. Two tracks were cut from a little above the base (or top) of the nose up and over to the back of the head. One of these tracks was cut on each side, the surgeon explained, because it would give equal expansion to the two sides of the brain, and because it would cause death to cut through the middle of the top of the head, where lies "the superior longitudinal sinus." He left, therefore, the solid track of bone through the middle, and cut two grooves or tracks of bone, one on either side, where nature (when she does not make a mistake) leaves soft or yielding edges, by means of which the normal skull expands to fit the needs of the brain within.

The trench made displaced or cut away one-quarter of an inch of solid bone all the way from near the base of the nose to the back of the head. In the middle of the top of the head on each side a crosswise cut was made, and one inch of bone divided. Another cut was made on either side, slanting toward the ears. This was one and a half inches long. The surgeon then tenderly inserted his forefingers, pressed the internal mass loose from the bones where it adhered, and pushed the bones wider apart. This process widened the trenches to one inch.

The wound was now dressed with the wonderful effective new aseptics, and the flesh and skin closed over. The operation had taken an hour and a half. There was little bleeding. The baby was, of course, unconscious during the entire time. Oh, the blessing of anæsthetics! And now comes the wonderful result of this bold and radical but tender and humane operation.

The baby rallied well. In three days it showed improved intelligence. In eight days this improvement was marked. From a creature that sat listless, deformed, and unmindful of all about it, it began to "take notice," like other children. From an "it," it had been transformed into a "he." It had been given personality. It ate and slept fairly well.

On the tenth day the wound was exposed and dressed. It had healed or "united by first intention," as the doctors say, and again one can but exclaim, "Oh, those wonderful aseptic dressings! It had united without suppuration. It was a clean wound, cleanly healing.

One month after the operation the feet and hands had straightened out, and lost their jerky, aimless movements. The child is now a child. It acts and thinks like other children, laughs and cooes and makes glad the hearts of those who love it.—Helen H. Gardener, in Harper's Magazine.

How He Lost His Clothes.

A Georgia man, who was not aware of the fact that he was addicted to walking in his sleep, began to miss his clothes on awakening in the morning. Four suits disappeared mysteriously, when he was constrained to offer a reward of $25 for the detection of the thief. This prompted his son to investigate. He saw his sire arise and dress himself and proceed to a mill-pond. Here the old gentleman would disrobe, stuff his clothes in a hollow log as far as they would go and then go in bathing. When he emerged he would search vainly for his clothes, finally going home without them. The young detective fished from the hollow log every suit that had been lost and duly received the promised reward.

SCENES IN THE CITY OF MEXICO.

Where the Modern Yankee Touches Elbows with the Medieval Savage.

The street scenes of Mexico are beyond comparison the most instructive, amusing and entertaining of all possible experiences here, says a City of Mexico letter in the San Francisco Chronicle. To the American it is a new world and an old world combined. Architecture oriental and customs European he finds associated with "Yankee" street cars, electric lights and the finest asphalt block pavements. Ladies arrayed in the latest French fashions, Indian women whose only garment is the seboso, the native dude in his skin-tight trousers and yard-wide sombrero, the Mexican gentleman with kid gloves, white necktie and silk hat, the half-naked newsboy and the deformed beggar combine to form a picture and a pageant which never lacks variety and never loses interest.

There are streets as narrow as those of Constantinople, avenues as broad as those of Berlin, parks as beautiful as those of Paris, stores as busy as those of Boston, yet withal a nondescript people distinctively and unmistakably Mexican.

One can linger for hours in the Zocalo, or pleasure garden at the Plaza Major, by day or by night, and find the scene more fascinating than a play. By day there is the unending procession of over-laden donkeys and human beasts of burden, carrying, moving, packing everything transportable: long lines of short-coated, broad-brimmed coachmen, whose agility in securing a fare bears no proportion to the time of reaching your destination; street cars arriving and departing in trains of from two to six cars for all parts of the city and suburban towns; gay scenes about the flower market; squads of soldiers moving to animating music, and the ever-varying phases of life incident to a metropolitan career.

By night it is music and promenade, rest and recreation. We have no estimate of the thousands who throng the Zocalo the five nights in a week on which there is music from the "grand stand." The public seats are usually inadequate for the sitters, and hundreds of chairs are rented by the hour for a trifling sum, varying according to supply and demand. No student of political economy could spend three evenings in the Zocalo or Alameda of Mexico without becoming convinced that good music at municipal expense would be a profitable investment as a police regulation in any city.

There are 500 miles of streets within the gates of the City of Mexico, and not a block upon which something is not offered for sale. The Mexican merchant, whether behind the counter or upon the curbstone, is never importunate but always courteous. He never "drives" a bargain, but almost always asks more than he is willing to take. As a rule he is content with small profits, but quick sales are no consideration.

The prejudice against the "gringoes" (Yankees), once so bitter, has been greatly modified since the advent of railroads and the establishment of a truly liberal government. A dozen years ago a knowledge of the English language was actually an impediment for a person desiring employment in Mexico. To-day scores of young men of Mexican birth and "bringing up" are proficient in its use, and it is considered an accomplishment to "talk United States." Hotels and restaurants, a few years ago entirely indifferent to American custom, now cater to its entertainment.

There has been a notable infusion of business methods into the higher grades of commerce and a quickening of the commercial pulse in all branches of trade.

A Siberian Quarantine.

Nothing of interest happened to us until late in the evening, when, just as we were turning up from the river into a small peasant village, the name of which I have now forgotten, both we and our horses were startled by the sudden appearance of a wild-looking man in a long, tattered sheepskin coat, who, from the shelter of a projecting cliff, sprang into the road ahead of us, shouting a hoarse but unintelligible warning, and brandishing in the air an armful of blazing birch-bark and straw.

"What's the matter?" I said to our driver, as our horses recoiled in fright.

"It's the plague-guard," he replied. "He says we must be smoked."

The cattle-plague was then prevailing extensively in the valley of the upper Yenisei, and it appeared that round this village the peasants had established a sanitary cordon with the hope of protecting their own live stock from contagion. They had heard of the virtues of fumigation, and were subjecting to that process every vehicle that crossed the village limits. The "plague-guard" burned straw, birch-bark and other inflammable and smoke-producing substances around and under our pavoska until we were half strangled and our horses were frantic with fear, and then he told us gravely that we were "purified," and might proceed.—George Kennan, in the Century.

Looking After the Little Things.

A writer in the N. Y. Tribune urges women at the housecleaning time to make it a rule to inspect everything in the way of the fitting and furniture of the house. If there are slats out of the blinds or the blinds are out of order in any way have them repaired. Look at the locks and bolts and see that everything is in order, that the keys are in place and move easily in the lock. Sometimes when a lock is stiff a few drops of kerosene oil will make it all right. If there are cracked window panes do not wait till they come out themselves, but have them repaired now. Look at the cane-bottomed chairs and have new seats put in if they need it. It is a saving of money and endless annoyance to have articles out of repair promptly mended so they can be of service.

Harvard College is 225 years old and has graduated 17,000 students. A little more than half of them are living.

SUMMER SLEEPING ANIMALS.

Several Which Reverse the Supposed Usual Order of Things.

Every one knows that a large number of animals sleep in protected places during the cold season of the year and wake in the summer. A similar phenomenon is the summer sleep of different reptiles—principally serpents and crocodiles—which thus pass the time of greatest heat in tropical regions. But that reptiles and amphibious animals, native to the temperate zones, frequently spend the hot days in a "summer sleep" is not so well known. Dr. Franz Werner has recently had this discussed in the zoological-botanical society of Vienna, and furnishes the following particulars, as reported in the N. Y. Staats Zeitung. During the months of July and August it will be observed by those who pay any attention to outdoor animal life that reptiles and amphibians are noticeably fewer in number than during the spring months; but if they begin to hunt under large, smooth stones, in holes in the ground, on the edges of marshes and ponds, under brushwood and heaps of dead leaves, they will not seldom find these animals, either alone or in great groups, in a condition very similar to sleep; not, indeed, so sound as the "winter sleep," but the eyes are fully closed and the breathing a little slower. The frogs sit huddled together and make no attempt to flee, only burrowing somewhat deeper into the earth. Lizards and salamanders lie almost motionless, with the tails over their heads, and even the latter feel almost dry. Snakes are rolled up like spirals, and, as a rule, with the head concealed. They are, however, the most quickly roused.

The reason of this summer sleep is different, according as the animal lives on land or in the water. Those on land sleep during the greatest heat; those in the water only when their usual dwelling place is dried up, which generally, though not necessarily, occurs during the high temperature. The water salamanders are always in a partial summer sleep: those which live in the water during the whole year do not sleep in summer, such as the water frog, which lives in ponds and marshes well supplied with water. It is generally supposed that our reptiles enjoy the heat of summer, so that, as this increases, they improve in health. But this is not always the case; rather it has been found that many of our reptiles are killed by a prolonged exposure to the heat of the sun, and if we observe lizards in the open air we may be sure that they do not stay out very long under the beams of the sun, but go back from time to time to their dwellings. Only turtles can remain exposed to a glowing sun any length of time without some shade. Lizards and snakes often succumb in half an hour. The summer sleep of these animals is a regular habit wherever the warmth of the sun annually reaches its height; that is to say, from every noon until about 3 o'clock, and increases where the rainfall is light and infrequent. In places where intense heat is of rare occurrence a similar phenomenon is observed in these years only. In captivity these animals have neither a winter nor a summer sleep, because the temperature of the cages is kept warmer in winter and cooler in summer than in the open air.

Catching Terrapin.

In the shoal waters along the coast south of Cape Henlopen, terrapin are caught in various ways. Dredges dragged along in the wake of a sailing vessel pick them up. Nets stretched across some narrow arm of river or bay entangle the feet of any stray terrapin in their meshes: but these require the constant attention of the fisherman to save the catch from drowning. In the winter, in the deeper water, the terrapin rise from their muddy quarters on mild sunny days and crawl along the bottom. They are then taken by tongs, their whereabouts being often betrayed by bubbles.

The method shown in the drawing is resorted to only in the spring, and in water not over a foot or two in depth. Turtles will rise at any noise, and usually the fisherman only claps his hands, though each hunter has his own way of attracting the terrapin. One hunter whom I saw when I made the drawing uttered a queer guttural noise that seemed to rise from his boots.

Whatever the noise, all turtles within hearing—whether terrapin or "snapper"—will put their heads above water. Both are welcome and are quickly sold to the market-men. The snapper slowly appears and disappears, leaving scarcely a ripple; and the hunter cautiously approaching usually takes him by the tail. The terrapin, on the contrary, is quick, and will descend in an oblique direction, so that a hand-net is needed unless he happens to come up near by. If he is near enough the man jumps for him. The time for hunting is the still hour at either sunrise or sunset.—St. Nicholas.

An Arizona Judge.

At a county election in Arizona a well known worthless fellow was put up in fun for election as judge. He was made gloriously drunk early in the day and his opponent anticipated an easy victory, but when the votes were counted it was found that the drunken candidate had swept the field. Everyone had been voting for him for fun, and the fun turned out to the good fortune of the drunkard. When he learned of his election he got drunker than ever, and stayed so all the time he was judge.

Raising Alligators.

A Louisianian, at Bird's Mill, has gone into the business of raising alligators. He has purchased land on both sides of a small neck of water and will fence it in. He has a number of men engaged in catching small alligators and gathering eggs.

The debtor is the fellow who isn't at all anxious to have his creditors hurry on his account.—Rochester Post.

GOING TO FUNERALS.

Strangers to the Family Who Find Much Satisfaction in Attending.

"I am often led to wonder," said a lady, as she returned home from the funeral of a dear friend, "what sentiment of the human heart it is that prompts strange people who haven't the slightest interest in the deceased or the family to go to every funeral within reach. It seems as though there was in many minds a morbid curiosity that leads them to present themselves on such occasions, and stand around and look on with eagerness, watching every movement, and feeling almost defrauded if anything important escapes their notice. Such a tendency should be immediately checked in the young, as the sentiment is not by any means a creditable one, and often leads to the most absurd exhibition of curiosity.

"I remember being present some time since at the funeral of a neighbor. The services were held in the church, and, as is the custom in many places, the casket was opened so that the friends might take a last look at the departed if they so desired. The people from one side of the church passed around to the front, where the casket was placed, and down the opposite side aisle, either resuming their seats or waiting in the vestibule. My attention was attracted by a group of children in the little procession, and, to my surprise, again and again the same children passed around the front and down the side aisle, crossing at the rear of the church, again to fall into line and continue the round and round march. No one seemed to observe them or put a stop to their promenade. I couldn't help but wonder whether that wasn't the sort of sentiment which, permitted in the young, makes inveterate and incorrigible theater-goers in later life.

"It is fondly to be hoped that the time will come when all funerals will be held in private houses, and as far as possible at evening. The services are much more impressive at night, and an ordinary private house is, or should be, amply sufficient to contain those whose legitimate right it is to be present.

"Very few persons except those in public life have a sufficiently large circle of acquaintance to warrant a church funeral. Of course, as affairs at present stand, custom rules in this as in many other matters, but there seems to be a gradual narrowing of the limits of a funeral congregation.

"Where there are many persons at the church it is often the case that the announcement is made that the interment will be strictly private. This is, or should be, a sufficient bar to the presence of the curious, who often go to such places merely to gratify a morbid sentiment."—N. Y. Ledger.

A Wonderful Breed of Chickens.

There was a man at the Palmer house who has invented a new kind of chicken. He calls it the Palatine, and his friends call him Sam Arnold. He hails from New Castle, Ind. Arnold and Henry Jones, the fowl expert of Illinois, were discussing the invention the other morning.

"It has been the aim of my life," said Arnold to Jones, "to produce a fowl that would combine weight with youth."

Jones nodded.

"It is easy enough, of course, to fatten an old fowl. But the product is pretty apt to be tough. Spring chickens are always tender—that is genuine spring chickens, but they are too small to make much money out of."

Jones nodded again.

"Well, I experimented and experimented and at last I have what I call an unqualified success. It is a cross between the Plymouth Rock rooster and the Dorking hen, and the chickens I have raised have in the short space of eight weeks acquired a weight of twelve pounds."

Jones' eyes threatened to fall out on his cheeks.

"I assure you upon my honor that this is true," declared Arnold. "It is within the province of anybody to profit by my discovery, for there is a market large enough for all. When the chicks shall have acquired their full growth I'll make another cross and get a chick which at the age of 8 weeks will be the size of—"

"An ostrich," suggested Jones.

"Not exactly," said Arnold. "But still there is no disputing the fact that fowls have not been developed in the limit of possibility. I have been very successful and I propose to continue my experiments. Will you join me?"

Mr. Jones said that he would and the resurrection of the extinct species known as the roc is to be expected. Mr. Arnold is an old resident of New Castle. He makes a livelihood raising chickens, and his discoveries have been frequent in the fowl world.—Rochester Post-Express.

Vendettas in the Philippines.

Blood vengeance is a sacred law with the Quiangunes. If one plebeian is killed by another the matter is settled in a simple manner by killing the murderer or some one of his family who is likewise a plebeian. But if a prominent man or noble is killed by a plebeian, vengeance on the murderer, a mere plebeian, is not enough; the victim of the sin offering must be an equivalent in rank. Another nobleman must fall for the murdered noble, for their doctrine is, What kind of an equivalent is it to kill some one who is no better than a dog? Hence the family of the slain noble looks around to see if it can not find a relative of the murderer to wreak vengeance upon who is also a noble; while the murderer himself is ignored. If no noble can be found among his relatives the family of the murdered man wait patiently till some one of them is received into the nobles' caste; then the vendetta is prosecuted, although many years may have elapsed. When the blood feud is satisfied a reconciliation of the contending factions takes place. In all the feuds the heads of the murdered champions are cut off and taken home, and the head hunters celebrate the affair festally. The skulls are fixed to the front of the house.—Popular Science Monthly.

A Woman's Answer.

You ask my hand to-day, and, bending near,
Your eyes meet mine; I hear your words that burn.
But with my hand goes all I hold most dear;
What have you, then, to offer in return?

You say you love me. Men have loved before,
But not like you? Ah! you are not the first.
Shall it be "yes" or "no?" I'll think it o'er,
For by the words our lives are blessed or cursed.

You offer bonds or titles, gold and lands,
Whisper of all they buy, of friends and fame;
'Tis insult! Higher things my life demands
Before I share the honor of your name.

Say you my talk is idle—heart is chill?
Stop, stop, my friend; turn not so cold away,
Hear with me for a moment, if you will,
And briefly hear the words I have to say.

Like must wed like or life die out in pain;
By natural growth our natures must expand.
I cannot choose the hill and you the plain,
We two must go together, hand in hand.

I cannot dwarf my mind, my soul aspires,
I could not stay and in the valley sing.
To you far heights where glow celestial fires,
You, too, must soar and match me wing for wing.

This is my answer: read it plain and straight,
Offer no word of love, no mute caress:
If your soul claims me as its kindred mate,
Close to your heart I'll rapturously whisper;
"Yes!"

But if it does not, come not to my side:
But heed my words, my friend, and turn and go,
Lest touched my scorn and roused my woman-pride,
There's but one answer to your question:
"No!"

THE FISHERMAN'S WIFE.

It was night. The cabin, poor, but warm and cosy, was full of half twilight, through which the objects of the interior were but dimly visible by the glimmer of the embers which flickered on the hearth, and reddened the dark rafters overhead. The fisherman's nets were hanging on the wall. Some homely pots and pans twinkled on a rough shelf in the corner. Beside a great bed with long, falling curtains, a mattress was extended on a couple of old benches on which five little children were asleep like cherubs in a nest. By the bedside, with her forehead pressed against the counterpane, knelt the children's mother. She was alone. Outside, the black ocean, dashed with stormy snow-flakes, moaned and murmured, and her husband was at sea.

From his boyhood he had been a fisherman. His life, as one may say, had been a daily fight with the great waters, for every day the children must be fed, and every day, rain, wind or tempest, out went his boat to fish. And while in his four-sailed boat he plied his solitary task at sea his wife at home stitched the sails, mended the nets, looked to the hooks or watched the little fire where the fish soup was boiling. As soon as the five children were asleep she fell upon her knees and prayed heaven for her husband in his struggle with the waves and darkness.

And truly such a life as his was hard. The likeliest place for fish was a mere speck among the breakers, not more than twice as large as his own cabin — a spot obscure, capricious, changing on the moving desert, and yet which had to be discovered in the fog and tempest of a winter night by sheer skill and knowledge of the tide and winds. And there—while the gliding waves ran past like emerald serpents and the gulf of darkness rolled and tossed, and the straining rigging groaned as if in terror—there, amid the icy seas, he thought of his own Jenny: and Jenny, in her cottage, thought of him with tears.

She was thinking of him then and praying. The seagull's harsh and mocking cry distressed her, and the roaring of the billows on the reef alarmed her soul. But she was wrapped in thoughts—thoughts of their poverty. Their little children went barefooted winter and summer. Wheat bread they never ate, only bread of barley. Heavens! the wind roared like the bellows of a forge, and the seacoast echoed like an anvil. She wept and trembled. Poor wives whose husbands are at sea! How terrible to say, "My dear ones—father, lover, brothers, sons—are in the tempest!" But Jenny was still more unhappy. Her husband was alone—alone without assistance on this bitter night. Her children were too little to assist him. Poor mother! Now she says, "I wish they were grown up to help their father!" Foolish dream! In years to come, when they are with their father in the tempest, she will say, with tears, "I wish they were but children still!"

* * * * * *

Jenny took her lantern and her cloak. "It is time," she said to her herself, "to see whether he is coming back, whether the sea is calmer, and whether the light is burning on the signal mast." She went out. There was nothing to be seen—barely a streak of white on the horizon. It was raining, the dark, cold rain of early morning. No cabin window showed a gleam of light.

All at once, while peering round her, her eyes perceived a tumbledown old cabin, which showed no sign of light or fire. The door was swinging in the wind; the worm-eaten walls seemed scarcely able to support the crazy roof, on which the wind shook the yellow, filthy tufts of rotten thatch.

"Stay," she cried. "I am forgetting the poor widow whom my husband found the other day alone and ill. I must see how she is getting on."

She knocked at the door and listened. No one answered. Jenny shivered in the cold sea wind.

"She is ill. And her poor children! She has only two of them; but she is very poor and has no husband."

She knocked again, and called out, "Hey, neighbor!" but the cabin was still silent.

"Heaven!" she said, "how sound she sleeps that it requires so much to wake her!'

At that instant the door opened of itself. She entered. Her lantern illuminated the interior of the dark and silent cabin, and showed her the water falling from the ceiling as through the openings of a sieve. At the end of the room an awful form was lying—a woman stretched out motionless, with bare feet and sightless eyes. Her cold, white arm hung down among the straw of the pallet. She was dead. Once a strong and happy mother, she was now only the specter which remains of poor humanity after a long struggle with the world.

Near the bed on which the mother lay two little children—a boy and a girl—slept together in their cradle and were smiling in their dreams. Their mother, when she felt that she was dying, had laid her cloak across their feet and wrapped them in her dress, to keep them warm when she herself was cold.

How sound they slept in their old tottering cradle, with their calm breath and quiet little faces? It seemed as if nothing could awake those sleeping orphans. Outside, the rain beat down in floods and the sea gave forth a sound like an alarm bell. From the old creviced roof, through which blew the gale, a drop of water fell on the dead face and ran down it like a tear.

* * * * * *

What had Jennie been about in the dead woman's house? What was she carrying off beneath her cloak? Why was her heart beating? Why did she hasten with such trembling steps to her own cabin without daring to look back? What did she hide in her own bed behind the curtain? What had she been stealing?

When she entered the cabin the cliffs were growing white. She sank upon the chair beside the bed. She was very pale; it seemed as if she felt repentance. Her forehead fell upon the pillow, and at intervals, with broken words, she murmured to herself, while outside the cabin moaned the savage sea.

"My poor man! Oh, heaven, what will he say? He has already so much trouble. What have I done now? Five children on our hands already! Their father toils and toils, and yet, as if he had not care enough already, I must give him this care more. Is that he? No; nothing. I have done wrong—he would do quite right to beat me. Is that he? No! So much the better! The door moves as if some one were coming in; but no. To think that I should be afraid to see him enter!"

Then she remained absorbed in thought and shivering with the cold, unconscious of all outward sounds, of the black cormorants, which passed shrieking, and of the rage of wind and sea.

All at once the door flew open, a streak of the white light of morning entered, and the fisherman, dragging his dripping net, appeared upon the threshold, and cried, with a gay laugh. "Here comes the navy!"

"You!" cried Jenny; and she clasped her husband like a lover and pressed her mouth against his rough jacket.

"Here I am, wife," he said, showing in the firelight the good-natured and contented face which Jenny loved so well.

"I have been unlucky," he continued.

"What kind of weather have you had?'

"Dreadful."

"And the fishing?"

"Bad. But never mind. I have you in my arms again, and I am satisfied. I have caught nothing at all. I have only torn my net. The deuce was in the wind to-night. At one moment of the tempest I thought the boat was foundering, and the cable broke. But what have you been doing all this time?"

Jenny felt a shiver in the darkness.

"I?" she said, in trouble. "Oh, nothing; just as usual. I have been sewing. I have been listening to the thunder of the sea, and I was frightened."

"Yes, the winter is a hard time. But never mind now."

Then, trembling as if she were going to commit crime.

"Husband," she said, "our neighbor is dead. She must have died last night, soon after you went out. She has left two little children, one called Wilhelm and the other Madeline. The boy can hardly toddle, and the girl only lisp. The poor, good woman was in dreadful want."

The man looked grave. Throwing into a corner his fur cap, sodden by the tempest: "The deuce!" he said, scratching his head. "We already have five children; this makes seven. And already in bad weather we have often to go without our supper. What shall we do now? Bah, it is not my fault; it's God's doing. These are things too deep for me. Why has he taken away their mother from these mites? These matters are difficult to understand. One has to be a scholar to see through them. Such tiny scraps of children! Wife, go and fetch them. If they are awake they must be frightened to be alone with their dead mother. We will bring them up with ours. They will be brother and sister to our five. When God sees that we have to feed this little girl and boy besides our own he will let us take more fish. As for me, I will drink water. I will work twice as hard. Enough! Be off and get them! But what is the matter? Does it vex you? You are generally quicker than this."

His wife drew back the curtain."

"Look!" she said.—Translated from the French of Victor Hugo.

An Epitaph.

Upon the headstone of a grave in the Old Fort cemetery at Winslow, Me., is inscribed this epitaph: "Here lies the body of Richard Thomas, an Englishman by birth, a whig of 70. By occupation a cooper. Like an old rum puncheon, marked, numbered and shooked, he will be raised again and finished by his Creator. He died Sept. 28, 1814. America, my adopted country, my advice to you is this: 'Take care of your liberty.'"

Little Georgia was visiting a short time ago in a family who were fond of lawn tennis, and saw for the first time a racket. She seized it the moment her eyes fell upon it, and began making mysterious passes across it with both hands. She labored at this till at last her patience gave out, and she threw down the racket in disgust, exclaiming: "I don't see how you can make any music out of that kind of a fiddle."—Youth's Companion.

IN PERIL IN THE AIR.

What an Aeronaut Thought During a Half Minute's Fall.

"There is some kind of a fatality pursuing me in Detroit," remarked Prof. Bartholomew to a reporter of the Free Press recently. "First, Cole, was hurt, by his own folly, however, in monkeying on his parachute when he was coming down; then Hogan was killed; Miss Carmo drops within ten feet of an unfathomable abyss of mud in a sulphur marsh, and to-day I have met a man who witnessed the most narrow escape from death I ever had.

"The incident referred to occurred two years ago at Terre Haute, Ind. I shall never forget my experience on that day. A number of outsiders held the ropes of the balloon while it was being inflated, and one of the men amused himself by tying a big knot in his guy. I did not realize the danger from that knot until it came near being the cause of my death. My ascent was unusually high on that day, and it was the means of saving my life.

"I straddled the bar of my parachute and launched myself off. I felt the cord which held the parachute to the balloon snap, and a second later there was another 'tug' from above. I looked up and there was that knot on the guy swung around six of the parachute cords, forming as neat a half hitch as you ever saw in your life and holding me to the balloon. You have noticed that there is a weight attached to the top of the balloon which turns the bag upside down as it is released of the weight of the aeronaut. The guy rope which was half hitched around the strings of my parachute was also fastened to the top of the balloon, and the latter turned up and began discharging the hot air instantly as I jumped. The air escaped as you see it every day here, gradually, and of course my parachute descended very gradually at first, and not inflating. Down I kept coming, the guy rope preventing the parachute from inflating, and I gave myself up as lost; I wound my legs around the ropes of the parachute trapeze and shut my teeth. The speed commenced to be fearfully accelerated, and I was sure that I had to die, but I was cool and retained my senses.

"Soon the balloon had emptied itself and commenced flapping its huge tail in the air with awful swishes. The balloon weighed over 200 pounds and was also pulled down by the sixty-pound sand bag. It came down past me, and as the knotted guy rope slipped down the lines the parachute opened with such a fierce snap that it seemed as if the ropes which supported me would give away. The spreading of the parachute saved my life, for the 200-pound balloon kept on down and broke the six cords held captive by the guy rope as if they had been pack threads. It takes a long time to tell the story, but it all happened in half a minute. I was within 400 feet of the ground when the balloon tore away, but my fall was checked and I landed all right.

"Everybody thought I was a goner that day, and a more excited crowd than had gathered around where I was to have fallen you never saw. There is no mistake about my being scared that day, but I folded my parachute and balloon as coolly as if nothing had happened and went to bed for the remainder of the week."—Detroit Free Press.

HIS DEAD FATHER'S FACE.

It Appears at His Dead Daughter's Coffin to Confute a Friend's Disbelief.

I stood alone, looking at the unconscious face before me, which was distinctly visible, though the light was heavily shaded to keep the glare from the dying eyes, says a writer in the Arena. All her life my friend had been a christian believer, with an unwavering faith in a life beyond this, and for her sake a bitter grief came upon me, because, so far as I could see, there was no ground for that belief. I thought I could more easily let her go into the unknown if I could but feel that her hope would be realized, and I put into words this feeling.

I pleaded that if there were any of her own departed ones present at this supreme moment could they not and would they not give me some least sign that such was a fact, and I would be content. Slowly over the dying one's face spread a mellow radiant mist—I know no other way to describe it. In a few moments it covered the dying one's face as with a veil, and spread in a circle of about a foot beyond over the pillow, the strange yellowish white light, all more distinct from the partial darkness of the room. Then from the center of this, immediately over the hidden face, appeared an apparently living face with smiling eyes, which looked directly into mine, gazing at me with a look so full of comforting assurance that I could scarcely feel frightened. But it was so real and so strange that I wondered if I were temporarily crazed, and as it disappeared I called a watcher from another room and went out into the open air for a few moments to recover myself under the midnight stars. When I was sure of myself I returned and took my place again alone. Then I asked that, if that appearance were real and not a hallucination, would it be made once more manifest to me; and again the phenomenon was repeated, and the kind, smiling face looked up to me—a face new to me, yet wondrously familiar. Afterward I recalled my friend's frequent description of her dead father, whom she dearly loved, but whom I had never seen, and I could not help the impression that it was his face I saw the hour that his daughter died.

The English matron objects to the modern fashion of advertising infant foods by means of photographs of lightly clad babies which have been reared upon them, because, forsooth, in future years when these infant girls, whose identity is established by the publication of their names beneath the portrait, become modest maidens, it will be embarrassing to have the man of the future possess these portraits of the misses in—shirts. Of course, the baby boys of today are assiduously collecting and preserving the portraits for future reference in case of meeting their originals.

LINCOLN IN THE WHITE HOUSE.

His Simplicity of Dress and Speech.

There, as in his father's cabin, or New Salem, or Vandilia, or Springfield, the man Lincoln never gave a fraction of thought or a moment of care to any question of dress. He followed the ordinary fashion and wore what the tailor, hatter and boot-maker made for him. And so clad, the humblest citizens stood in his presence without awe, and the highest dignitaries with perfect respect. The world has yet to learn that General Scott, or Lord Lyons, or Bishop Simpson, or Prince Napoleon, or Archbishop Hughes, or the Comte de Paris, or Chief-justice Taney ever felt humiliated by the dress or want of dignity of President Lincoln in state ceremonial or private audience. The eyes of these men were not upon the tailor's suit of broadcloth, but upon the President and the man, and in such a scrutiny Lincoln outranked any mortal who ever questioned him eye to eye in his long and strange career from New Salem to the Blue Room of the White House.

As with his dress, so with his manner. Tempered and modified by the gravity of added years, and an ever-widening experience among varied social classes and conditions in many parts of the Union, it nevertheless retained to the last a strong impress of the essential characteristics of the frontier—simplicity, directness and sincere heartiness. He never learned and never used meaningless or misleading conventional phrases. He would say, "I am glad to see you." He would never say, "I am charmed to see you." He always greeted his visitors with a cordial shake of the hand and a winning look or smile, unless, as very rarely happened, his mind was weighed down with a preoccupation of overwhelming care and suspense. He always listened with patience, even when the request of his petitioner might be frivolous or foolish. That he was fond of wit, and jest, and laughter, the world already knows. He gave others courtesy, kindness and consideration to the last degree, and never by word or look assumed that he demanded them for himself.—J. G. Nicolay, in the Century.

FARM-HOUSE UNDER THE TREES.

Perhaps no act of war engendered more bitterness than the burning of the barns and houses in the Shenandoah Valley under Sheridan's official order. When soldiers are commanded they must obey, whether to charge a battery or burn some grayheaded mother out of house and home. While the order may have meant barns alone, there wasn't one chance in five of any house escaping where the barn was fired. Only those troopers detailed to carry out the order can realize what it meant and the hardships entailed. The order was imperative—those in command of the details merciless.

No warning was given, unless the great clouds of smoke rising up here and there to signify destruction were taken as warnings of what was to come. A squad of men galloped up—the women and children were told the substance of the order, and the match was applied. An hour later they sat on the grass houseless and homeless, some of them almost naked and dumb in the terror. War had brought a thousand hardships; this order brought ruin and desolation. There were tears and prayers and pleadings, but the order had gone forth. There were helpless old women to be carried out of their beds and laid in the orchard—old men who were bed-ridden must leave the roof-tree under which they had been born. One might pity, but one could not protest.

By and by, as we rode up to a quaint old farm-house, half-hidden among the fruit trees, a rifle cracked and a trooper fell from his horse shot through the head. The black pillars of smoke dotting the valley had told the people what was coming. We had seen no men except those too old to bear arms. Here was one who had determined to defend his property—one man 'gainst company after company riding up and down and across. To the left of the house, facing the barn, an excavation had been made in the door-yard. The shot came from thence, and before we could get under cover a second bullet wounded one of the squad. Ten minutes later the barn and the stacks were on fire, and men under cover were keeping up a hot fire on the rifle-pit. Just as another squad, attracted by the firing, came up a third man was hit and grievously wounded.

Some of the scores of bullets fired must have found a target. There was a rush from all sides and then he was captured. Fifty men had captured one. And that one! We had expected to find some bushy-bearded bushwhacker who had left Mosby's band in its forest rendezvous in the wild hope of defending his roof-tree, but it was not a man at all. It was a lad not a day over 14, and one of our carbine bullets had taken his life. And when we laid him on the grass and saw that he had come home wounded from some battle up the valley—when the mother came out to us from the house and fell on her knees and wailed and sobbed—when an old white-haired grandfather stood in the door, helpless to come out and look into our faces, but wailing out as if the sight of that dead boy was breaking his heart, what could we say? Nothing! What could we do? Only ride away and bemoan the cruelties of war.—M. Quad.

How to Treat a Beggar.

Chateaubriand was once asked, "Would you recommend me to apprentice my son to so and so?" and he replied: "Learn how this merchant treats the poor and then use your own judgment." There was a wisdom in this reply that should sink deep into people's hearts. Our treatment of the poor and unfortunate is the truest indication of our character. All that can be added to this excellent parable is, when one who is in want applies to you for assistance, imagine yourself in his place and "do as you would be done by."

The moon shines best when she is full. It is not so with the leading lights of society.—New Orleans Picayune.

Slaughter of Sea Birds.

It has sometimes been supposed that Coleridge, in the "Ancient Mariner," did something to check the barbarous custom of slaughtering sea birds, but a correspondent of a London contemporary informs a Manchester paper that in some of the Yorkshire watering places guns are regularly let out to visitors, who make a practice of killing and maiming the birds, for the mere pleasure of destroying them. The seagull is useless for food, and the men whose wanton cruelty is exposed do not, it seems, even attempt to secure their prey. The favorite plan is to fire at first indiscriminately. Then, when the birds hover over a wounded companion, wholesale and indiscriminate slaughter is attempted.—Black and White.

Tensile Strength of Steel.

As the result of long-continued experiment a method of manufacturing steel has been discovered by means of which its tensile strength is enormously increased. The tensile strength of the best tool steel is about 100,000 pounds, but it is claimed that by means of this new method a commercial steel can be produced that will stand a test of 200,000 pounds, and this too without any material addition to the cost.

Beware of Ointment fo Catarrh that contains Mercury, as mercury will surely destroy the sense of smell and completly derange the whole system when entering it through the mucous surfaces. Such articles should never be used except on prescriptions from reputable physicians, as the damage they will do is ten fold to the good you can possibly derive from them. Hall's Catarrh Cure, manufactured by F. J. Cheney & Co., Toledo, O., contains no mercury, and is taken internally, and acts directly upon the blood and mucous surfaces of the system. In buying Hall's Catarrh Cure be sure and get the genuine. It is taken internally, and made in Toledo, Ohio, by F. J. Cheney & Co.

"German Syrup"

A Farmer at Edom, Texas, Says:

"We are six in family. We live in a place where we are subject to violent Colds and Lung Troubles. I have used German Syrup for six years successfully for Sore Throat, Cough, Cold, Hoarseness, Pains in the Chest and Lungs, and spitting-up of Blood. I have tried many different kinds of cough Syrups in my time, but let me say to anyone wanting such a medicine—German Syrup is the best. That has been my experience. If you use it once, you will go back to it whenever you need it. It gives total relief and is a quick cure. My advice to everyone suffering with Lung Troubles is —Try it. You will soon be convinced. In all the families where your German Syrup is used we have no trouble with the Lungs at all. It is the medicine for this country. John Franklin Jones.

How to Fold an Umbrella.

Many umbrellas are broken by the careless manner in which they are folded and put aside after using in the rain. When folding an umbrella the cover should first be shaken out until all the folds lie free from the ribs. Then catch the ends of the ribs near the handle in the right hand and, closing the left hand firmly around the cover near the point, push the umbrella through it, gently turning the entire structure from left to right until all is neatly folded. After using an umbrella in the rain it should be allowed to dry, handle downward.

Farm For Sale.

Ames Has Survived.

NO HUMAN LIVES LOST IN THE THRASHING BOILER EXPLOSION—AMES IS OUT OF DANGER—A MIRACULOUS ESCAPE.

Dr. John Watson, who was called upon to attend the victims of the boiler explosion last Thursday, says all are out of danger and improving rapidly. Lucius Ames alone was critically injured, but he had a narrow escape. Several days he lingered between life and death, but finally rallied and has since improved rapidly. The dector says he was badly scalded besides being lacerated by pieces of the flying iron. Steve Ford, one of the other injured, was in just such a condition as if an Indian had been surprised in the act of scalping him, a piece of flying iron having ripped his scalp open for several inches. From this wound, skillfully dressed, the patient suffered but little inconvenience. Alrin Barker was cut in the face and forehead and will probably wear a scar the remainder of his days. The explosion was terriffic and the machine was broken into hundreds of pieces and scattered in all directions—it is simply a miracle that anything there could come out of it alive. There were many shocked at the intelligence of the disaster, and all these are happy at the comparatively happy outcome.

Gone to Her Rest.

This morning at 11:30 Mrs. Cyprien Gosselin breathed her last at the home of the family on Bottineau avenue. Mrs. Gosselin was surrounded by her husband, her son Peter, her daughters Mrs. L. La-Point of East Grand Forks, Mrs. O. Leveck, Mrs. Henry Lemieux, and Miss Delia Gosselin. She retained consciousness and bore with Christian fortitude the intense suffering, until the final agony brought oblivion. The fatal disease was cancer, with which she had suffered for many months. Our deepest sympathy goes out to those who have thus been robbed of a loving wife and mother.

The funeral will take place Saturday morning, the services at St. Joseph's church at 9:30 and the interment at St. Mary's cemetery.

Deceased, whose maiden name was Perpetuous Orino, was born in Canada on March 1, 1832; was married to Cyprien Gosselin at Champlain on Lake Champlain N. Y. July 16th, 1850. Fourteen children were born to them, five of whom reside in this vicinity. The family arrived in Red Lake Falls on the 3d of Sept. 1883.

Another domestic sensation. The rumors to-day give a racy flavor to the narrative of what was almost a tragedy. Constant domestic controversy terminates in a threat of murder by a husband. The wife's fair tresses are yanked about and the children to the rescue.

Ole Temley of Terrebonne wishes us to state that there came to his premises in section 30, Emardville township, on the 23d of October, five calves, two black, one red and one red and white. Owner is requested to call for same, and to pay costs and damages.

Models of Persistency.

Rev. Heman Wayland, son of the former president of Brown University, has married Miss Frances Green, of Providence, R. I., after a betrothal of forty years. The opposition came from Miss Green's mother.

The New Church Building.

Progress has been rapid in arrangement for St. Joseph's new church building and responses for cash subscriptions have been prompt and liberal. Joseph Paradis, Thomas Blair and Pierre Emard have been passing around a subscription list, and while none of the donations are large, there are many liberal ones, and a refusal has not been met with. The largest is $50 and the smallest is 50c. Up to this time the list has not been completed; in fact it is just started, but $800 represents the total amount. It is thought about $3,000 cash will be raised, and work will be begun on the building within a week or two. Sivigney & Herard will have the contract to build the church. It will be a handsome structure, surmounted by a fine steeple. Who will say that the erection of the first church spire in Red Lake Falls does not mark an epoch in its history? It is a pleasure to note that everything works methodically; and it is apparant again that—"In unity there is strength." Let the good work go on.

Modern Magicians.

Among the wild tribes of Africa, and equally so among the aboriginese of America, the magician, or medicine-man, is looked upon as endowed with supernatural powers. Some are specialists, and among these the most valued and respected are the "rain makers." Rain being indispensable to the maintenance of either animal or vegetable life, it is not to be wondered at that those supposed to have the power to bring the welcome showers should be reverenced as almost divine benefactors. These are regarded as savage superstitions, but stange to say, "rain makers" have appeared in day and country. The United State government had a crop of rain makers in Taxes last summer who with a series of terrific explosions, produced rain—with some exceptions. One Melbourne, of Ohio, deluged Cheyenne with water from the clouds, without artiliery, ballons, or other visible means. These reports may be exaggerated; they may not be truer and the magicians may be only humbugs. One modern magician, however, has demonstrated a clear title—and he is the inventor of the railroad. Transportation is easy, swift, and even luxuriously comfortable—provided your ticket is over "The Burlington," the great scenic and vestibuled line of the Northwest. Foa tickets, maps, and time tables, call on any of its ticket agent, or address W. J. C. Kenyon, Gen. Pass. Agent C., B. & N. R. R., St. Paul, Minn.

For Sale.—Seven yoke of good working cattle. P. & J. Meehan, Thief River Falls, Minn.

An Important Subject.

TO FARMERS AND THOSE INTERESTED IN HUSBANDRY.—FLAX AND THE DEMAND FOR FIBER.

Minnesota farmers are not taking hold of the flax question as it was hoped they would, and as a result the Minneapolsi Linen Mills are still buying the most of their fiber from Canada. V. W. Bayless, of the company, has for some time been in correspondence with Prof. Dodge, of the department of agriculture, whose opinion it now is that the establishing of numerous small mills throughout the flax country is about the only way by which the farmers can be interested. As a class they are averse to trying what they concieve to be experiments or the fowling after strange gods. They never have raised flax, and do not want to do so now unless they see a profitable market for it close at home. Mr. Bayless agrees with Prof. Dodge, after having tried earnestly for more than a year to interest the farmers, and here the matter rests. "We are doing something in the way of interesting our home growers," says Mr. Bayless, "but it is in a very small way, and the linen mills do not feel it appreciably.

It has been hard work to convince the land owners that flax would grow successfully in Minnesota. Indeed the flax growers of Canada were honestly of the same opinon and had to be convinced. Recently W. A. Murray, of Starthroy, Ontario, an expert in flax culture and one of the most extensive farmers in the whole Dominion, visited Minneapolis. While here he inspected the linen mills and in conversation with the officers expressed the belief that suitable fiber could not be grown as far south as Minneapolis. "However," he added, "I am about to visit my former partner, Mr. Gunn, who has been operating a big farm near Janesville, Minn., for several years and experimenting with flax. His experience will settle the question conclusively, for he knows all about flax growing." Mr. Murray went to Janesville and from there home. A few days ago the linen mills people had a letter from him in which he says:

I found my friend, Mr. Gunn, at Janesville. He had sown over 100 acres of flax. The straw from the seed I sent home was several inches longer than the rest. He pulled only a small part of it, as labor was scarce, threshed it by allowing the seed ends to enter a common threshing machine and pulling them back again. He spread it to set and had not lifted it when I got there, altough it was about ready to lift. The color and strength were excellent. I took a handful or two home with me, broke and scutched it, and consider it equal to our best fiber. I am satisfied you can grow flax both for seed and fiber, but it needs pushing and patience to develop home production to the full extent of your requirements.

"This ought to be good testimony," said Mr. Bayless when he stopped reading, "and ought to encourage our farmers to take hold of the matter more willingly. One great trouble, however, is the absence of good threshing facilities. The threshing of the seed end is a very important thing, for it yields the seed for the succeeding harvest. The flax cannot be put through the ordinary wheat thresher without running it. Still, if Mr. Murray's idea is a good one, and it seems to be, I do not see why our farmers cannot use their wheat threshers and pull the stalks out after the seeds have been extracted. There are flax threshers in the market, but their purchase is a matter of some expense, which is another thing that keeps the famers form going into the business."

Mr. Bayless says that McMillan & Hastings, of Minneapolis, have raised a fine crop of flax this year—about 100 acres—in Southern Minnesota, and names half a dozen others who are experimenting with the matter. A good many of the farmers have given the subject so little attention that they do not know how to prepare their ground, how to secure their crop, how to ret or how to break: nor do many of them know the value of the fiber. These points have been brought out in the newspapers several times and have been incorporated into a pamphlet which Mr. Bayless is spending broadcast, as far as he is able, among the farmers of the state. The fact that the fiber is worth from $30 to $200 per ton according to the quality, saying nothing of the value of the seed, causes Mr. Bayless to think that the farmers are not wise when they neglect to cultivate the crop. His mill would much prefer to buy fiber at home and only buys abroad from necessity.—Minneapolis Journal.

An Excellent Reason.

Papa and his guest sat at table together,
And talked of the tariff, the crops, and the weather,
The Indian outlook, the Woman's Convention,
And other such matters too many to mention,
While poor little Dot, who distinctly preferred,
Like most of her sex, to be seen and be heard,—
Whose patience, in fact, neared the end of its tether,—
Was waiting a chance for her own little word.

A pause came at last; at the very first knocking
She seized opportunity—wasn't it shocking!
And chattered so fast that her father, astonished,
Concluded his Dot must be sternly admonished.
"My dear little girl,"—was his terrible way,—
"What makes you so noisy, I wonder, to-day?
A bit of your tongue I shall have to be docking."
But Dot answered back, with no sign of dismay,
"I's talkin' betause I's dot sumpfin' to say,"
—Mary E. Bradley, in St. Nicholas.

ELIZA THE NIHILIST.

What was I to do? Never was a woman placed in such a pitiable condition. I had been brought to Russia by an English sewing machine company to run their machines at an agency of theirs in —— street, in St. Petersburg, where a handsome shop had been taken.

One blustering cold day towards the close of October I found the shop door closed, and learned to my dismay that our agent had disappeared, and the machines had all been seized for rent and debts. What was to be done? All the money I had in the world was equivalent to £3. What was due to me I had left in our agent's hands, and I felt sure it was lost.

Fortunately, my room had been hired for the month, and had been paid for in advance. I had at least a roof over my head for a few weeks. An idea suddenly struck me. I had been making an evening dress on the machine for a Russian lady who spoke English.

She had some idea of buying a machine. In order to hasten with the work I had taken to my room the body of her dress, and, having a machine there, had sewed on it of nights. That machine I would certainly keep. It would go very little toward the payment of the debt the agent owed me.

I hurried home. Perhaps there was a letter with some money in it. There was nothing. I must find the lady, but how? She had left no address. She had hardly spoken to me. I thought I had heard her say that she would come again, and I believed that she had fixed on this very day. There was but one chance in a thousand. I must stand in the street and wait until she appeared.

I hastened back, and took up my position near the shop. I scanned every woman passing by. It was bitterly cold and raw, and the wind chilled me; I was faint with anxiety. Suddenly a carriage drove up, a footman opened the door, and a lady, elegantly dressed, alighted. I tore across the street—it was the Russian lady.

With my heart in my mouth I told her my pitiful story and begged her to help me. If she wanted a servant would she not try me? I had a sewing machine, and would make her dresses for nothing if I could only stop with her until I could write my people at home; they would send me money and I could get back to England.

"Where do you live?" she inquired, abruptly.

I told her.

"Get into the carriage," she said.

I did so. When we were off the main street she stopped the carriage, got out with me, and we walked to my lodgings. I opened the door. On the table was her dress body. It did not seem to interest her. She picked it up, however, glanced at it a moment, then threw it down on a chair and examined the sewing machine.

"How long would it take me to become proficient in working this?" she inquired, as she sat down before the machine and tried the pedals.

"Two weeks—perhaps less."

"Would it disfigure my hands?"

She took off her gloves, showed her well-cared for hands, her fingers glittering with rings.

"Your beautiful hands would hardly be spoiled."

"Well, then, give me a lesson at once—at once. I will pay you for your trouble."

She sat down, and under my instruction worked for an hour. She was wonderfully clever with her fingers and seemed to seize the peculiarities of the machine at once.

"At this rate of progress, madame, you would become quite a good workwoman in ten days," I said approvingly.

She made no reply, but worked away for another half hour.

"It's not so tiresome, after all," she said, "but I have had enough for to-day. To-morrow I will call, and you will then take the machine to pieces and show me how it must be put together again. You will oblige me very particularly by not going out to-day. I have to thank you for your patience. Keep my visit silent. I hope you have learned that in Russia it is better to keep a quiet tongue. Do not return to the shop. Pray take this for my first lesson," and she placed on the machine table a piece of gold.

Next morning early there was a low knock at my door. I opened it, and a woman plainly dressed entered. She did not say a word. She placed a bundle she held in her hand in a chair, and at once went to the machine and commenced sewing.

She was very silent, working incessantly on some coarse material she had brought with her. I sat near her, teaching her what to do. She worked on until it was past noon.

"Is it not time now to eat something?"

"It is," I replied. "Will madam partake of my simple meal?"

"Madam! I am Eliza—and you say your name is Mary. Mary, I shall be very glad to share your food with you, if you will let me. If you have not enough for two I will go out and buy what is wanted. What shall it be? I dare say I can shop better than you. Will you lend me your shawl and your furs and your overshoes?"

Before I could say a word she had them all on. Then she laughed for the first time and courtesied to me.

"Sister Mary, Sister Mary," she cried in great glee, "our copartnership begins from to-day. I am to be capital and you brains. Little sister, good-by. I shall not be gone more than a quarter of an hour."

I was so astonished as to be speechless. In a trice she was back, loaded down with packages. She had a loaf of bread, a piece of cheese, a pot of preserves, a breast of smoked goose and some salted cucumbers.

In a day I learned to love that woman. All the haughty, proud manner was gone. She waited on me. She was up first in the morning. She was always busy. The porter of the house evidently mistook her for one of the two girls who had been in the employ of the sewing machine company, for one or the other of them had often been in my room. Some small extra compensation was given him for the new lodger.

My companion, save for daily purchases made in the immediate neighborhood for food, never went out. No one called on her; she never received a letter. A few days over the month had passed, when one morning, as I was running up a seam in a piece of cloth, my needle struck something. It was a piece of paper.

"It is for me, Sister Mary," said Eliza.

She took the bit of paper, held it to the stove, appeared to read something, and then opened the stove door and burned it. I did not question her. She worked cheerfully all day, chatting on different subjects.

That night, when we were in bed, taking me in her arms, she said: "Poor Mary, your troubles, your anxieties, are now over. To-morrow, early, apply for your passport. It will cost you to go from here to London, say £30. I wish it could have been more, but you will have altogether £300, which, after deducting your traveling expenses, will leave you some money to begin your life with again. For me—who have learned to love a singularly honest and simple-minded woman—you shall have this ring," and she slipped on my finger a ring; "but don't wear it; the diamond might betray me. So far, Mary, you have run no risk, but next week you might be ruined forever, for you have harbored" ——

I was speechless with terror.

"Only a woman," she continued, "whose own life—or the life of any one else who stood in her way—she would care no more of taking than a cook would of wringing a chicken's neck. Do not be shocked, Mary. I shall sleep as sweetly to-night as if death did not threaten me. My story, as far as relates to you, is soon told.

"It became necessary for me a month ago to disappear. The simplest chance in the world threw you in my way. Had you been of any other nationality than English I would never have trusted you. You might go out, Mary, and sell me Judas-like, for a sum of money that would make you rich for life."

I clung convulsively to her and bade her be quiet.

"Through my veins, child, there runs the best blood in Russia, but every drop of it I will shed for the cause. Thank heaven for your lowly estate. You must go away to-morrow, and now good-night."

I begged her to come to England with me. She said:

"No; my place is here. I should be useless there."

Next morning out of a package of some rough material she produced, as if by magic, a roll of notes which, without counting, she handed to me.

"Later in the day there ought to arrive some furs for me, for poor Mary must not get cold. Now away with you."

Her old manner had returned.

"Get your passport. Go by Bremen to England, or the ice will delay you. Do not wait."

Still I was irresolute. I could not bear to leave her. She knelt to me and implored me to go. At last I consented.

My passport was given to me at police headquarters without a word.

"Is it all right?" she asked very quietly. "See, your furs have come. They are very beautiful and so warm."

"I have permission to leave."

"Thank God! See my work. I think I could do now without you."

"You do not love me, Eliza," I cried.

"Not love you—my sister! I loved my husband—he was shot. I loved my only child; in the agony of my grief—because his father was killed—he sucked poison from my breast and died. After them I love you best."

Then for the first time she burst into a paroxysm of tears.

"It is because I love you—that I might be your death."

As she wrung my hand she felt the ring on my finger.

"Off with it. You wore your mittens at the police office! If they had seen it! Quick, let me hide it!"

She took off my shoe and hid the ring in my stocking.

"Should you ever marry sell the ring or the stone in it, and you will not be portionless. Now off with you. I have made a bundle for you. The rest of your things you will give me. Here is a photograph of yours—you will let me keep it?"

She took me by the hand, gave me one long kiss, closed the door on me, and I never saw her more.

My trip home was without a single incident. My dear mother comforted me. Still there was some vague feeling of dread. My mind wandered in spite of all I could do toward my room companion. Picking up a newspaper when at home, some two weeks after my arrival, I read in the telegraphic dispatches:

> "St. Petersburg, Dec. 23.—An arrest of great importance has been made. One of the chief actors in the Nihilistic plots, a Russian princess, was taken, but only after she had killed one of the police. Disguised as a sewing machine woman, she had hitherto baffled the detectives."

"Pa, can any one keep lighthouses?" "No, my son, lighthousekeepers are appointed by the government." "Well, anyhow, it says here in the paper 'a gentleman and his wife want three unfurnished rooms for light housekeeping."—Washington Post.

MISS SOPER'S "PANTS."

A New Jersey Woman Who Devised a Costume on Account of a Cow.

Miss Mary F. Soper of Lodi, Saddle River township, Bergen county, N. J., has devised, cut out, and made a reformed and improved dress for herself, says the N. Y. World. It costs only $1.40 without the buttons, and those were solid silver ones made for her father's green overcoat forty years ago.

Mr. Soper is 82 years old and Miss Soper is—well, she said herself that it wasn't a fair question to ask her.

Miss Soper got up the costume on account of the cow. All of the brothers have married and gone and Miss Soper was left at home to take care of the old folks and the fifteen acres. There is plenty of rent-money coming in, so the fifteen acres is in pasture land, orchard, and garden, and a quaint old place it is in the still autumn afternoon. The only care people have there is to get just what they want to eat. Miss Soper's preference is milk.

"I used to buy milk from the man who pastured his cows down yonder," she said, "till I saw him milk one day and that turned me against milk for three whole days. His cows always looked so slobby and slack, so I bought Jessie and milked her myself. You can bet Jessie is kept clean. I wash her every day of my life and curry her, and she is just as clean as my face. It takes six buckets of water to wash her off and I reckon you would not like to get your skirts all slopped up, would you? I mean if you were a woman. No; I thought not.

"And then I have to wade through the wet grass to milk her, and if I want to dress convenient I don't know of anybody who has a better right. Oh, I know well enough who it was told about me wearing this cowboy suit of mine. I don't wear it all the time. You see that."

"Won't you put it on, Miss Soper?"

"I don't know as I'd better. What d'ye think, pa?"

Mr. Soper shook his six long, silvery curls and stroked his long, silvery beard and began to cry.

"Go put it on, daughter," he said.

Miss Soper began to cry too. This was embarrassing, but the clouds cleared away and Miss Soper tripped into the house and left the World reporter out in the front yard under the big pear tree while Mr. Soper told how he settled in Lodi when it was all timberland.

"You can come in now," chirruped Miss Soper through the green blinds of the front door. She had on the costume. It looks right neat. It is made of blue flannel without any trimming. There is a blouse waist, made loose and easy, with silver buttons on it and three little ones on each sleeve. The collar is rolling but not wide. There is a pocket over the heart, from which a white handkerchief can peep out jauntily. The waist is not belted, but has a band around it on which are buttoned the—the, ah—well, a man would call them trousers. The brakeman and conductor on the Lodi accommodation calls them "pants." Over these never-mind-whats a skirt falls to the knees, or just the least little wee bit below.

Then Miss Soper wears rubber boots that are tolerably long. There is no use talking, the costume does set off the fact that Miss Soper has two of the tiniest feet and trimmest ankles in the whole state of Jersey. It doesn't do justice to her waist, though. She is plump, but not too much so. She has made that waist a trifle too baggy.

"The minister's wife saw it," said Miss Soper, "and she said it was just like what the ladies wear on the mountains. She said she'd wear just such a costume only she hasn't got the figure for it. Well, now, don't you think it's pretty handy? I do. It's modest, too; but if I had it trimmed with braid up the leg"—Miss Soper hauled up the skirt two horrifying inches to illustrate—"I think it would look kind of loud."

She is quite poetic, is Miss Soper. There is a big beech tree down in the meadow lot under whose shade she sits and meditates. "I most generally sit on the fence," she said pensively.

"I think it's real lovely there." She showed the spot, and on the way thither told how her father could sit down and write any kind of a letter, all in poetry, just as fast as his pen would move. He had first been a blacksmith and then he was educated to be a Baptist preacher, but he hadn't ever followed it up much, she said, and she climbed a rail fence right handily as she spoke.

Just then the brakeman and conductor halloed:

"Hey, there! If you fellers is agoin' back to town you'd better come along."

"D'ye see her pants?" asked the brakeman and conductor, as he took the tickets. "Ain't they honey-coolers?"

They Have Hobbies.

The king of Italy takes great interest in raising camels.

Bishop Coleman, of Delaware, spends his vacation in pedestrian trips in the Virginia mountains.

The princess of Wales has become an adept in amateur photography. She carries about a detective camera.

Baron Nathan de Rothschild's hobby is photography. He commences his pleasure each day at 6 a. m., and transfixes many a family scene and view.

The duchess of Connaught quite equals Richelieu in her fondness for cats. Her favorite pet is one of these little animals imported from the land of the Shah.

It is one of Mr. Blaine's peculiarities that he has always preferred to speak out of doors. He would rather speak among the pine trees than in any hall in the world.

Russell Sage carries sixty-four curious coins for luck. One of the most precious is a penny that he found in his boyhood. He would not part with these coins for a (railway) prince's ransom.

"Could you not, if you tried, grant me a place in that icy heart of yours?" "My heart may be of ice, as you say, Mr. Sophleigh. But, all the same, I am not in the cold-storage business."

EXTREMES OVER A FIRST OFFER.

Deplorable Mistakes Which Young Women Are Apt to Make.

There are two deplorable extremes, into one of which a young girl usually falls on receiving her "first offer."

The worse and more frequent of these is that of fancying herself in love, when in reality she doesn't care a fig for her lover. The other consists in a coquettish pride which leads her, against the dictates of her judgment and the inclinations of her heart, to reject a suitor, however worthy.

When an honest man offers a woman his hand, with all the accompaniments of heart and name and fortune—whether these be exalted or lowly, he pays her the highest compliment in his power. Undeniably, she has a right to feel complimented, and she must be untrue to her womanhood does she not in some measure feel so, even though her suitor be beneath her regard; and the compliment will be valued very much in proportion to her estimation of the man.

But take a young girl whose imagination is colored with the hues of a summer's sun-rising, whose dove-like soul is waiting on quivering wings for love's first message, whose gentle heart pulsates in anticipation of love's ecstasy. When in her May morn some one comes offering her the sweetest and brightest of life's fragrance and beauty—does she pause to see whether there be any dust on his garments, any stain on his hand, any film on his eyes, any baseness in his heart?

No! Intoxicated with the perfume and bewildered with the beauty, she stands in the radiance of her rising sun, and sees her lover beneath its golden light.

Many a woman has blighted her own life and that of the man she loved by indulging a passion for coquetry. Having charms of which she is fully conscious; endowed, perhaps, with the advantages of wealth, position, and accomplishments, she proudly measures her power and says to herself:

"I am equal to great conquests; and shall I, thus early, submit to be conquered? I have cords with which to lead many captive; and shall I yield my hands to be manacled? I have power to bring the proud herd low—to melt the heart of stone—to wring the nerve of steel; and shall I put my own head on the block—my own heart in the crucible—my own nerves in the vise? No! When I have had a surfeit of these delights—then——"

But the time referred to in the long futurity of the little word "then" seldom comes to the coquette. It will always be "then." The "accepted time" is never near when once we have let the opportunity pass. At 18 the coquette asks: "Who is he?" at 28: "Where is he?"

Assuredly, to be loved implies some degree of liveliness, and she may be pardoned for feeling gratified with this highest of all compliments—this subtlest of all flattery. But why should she unhesitatingly throw herself into arms that may be extended only to ensnare her? On the other hand, why does she turn proudly from the embrace of one who may be fitted to meet every want of her womanhood?

Young girl, answer these questions to your own heart, and when you receive your "first offer" be not so flattered or self-deceived as either to accept or reject without careful deliberation.

Don't imagine that this is the last "chance" that you will ever have; neither, for the sake of flirting, throw it away.—St. Louis Globe Democrat.

How the Pyramids Were Built.

A moneyed man, who was looking yesterday at the process of laying an artificial stone pavement in front of one of his many properties, startled the friends who were standing about him by remarking: "I believe that the Egyptian pyramids were built in just that way." Pressed for an explanation, he said that while he had never been in Egypt he had read the works of all Egyptologists, including Brugsch and Piazzi Smyth, and had never found in any of them a theory which would satisfactorily account for the manner in which the pyramids were constructed. "Now," he said, "you must remember the pyramids are built of stone which bears no resemblance to anything found within five hundred miles of their location. It is incredible that the Egyptians of four or five thousand years ago should have possessed the mechanical ingenuity to move these enormous blocks of stone from the granite quarries of Abyssinia or Syria to the pyramids. Is it not much more natural to suppose that the ancient Egyptians possessed the secret of making artificial stone, and that the pyramids were constructed by layer upon layer of Nile River mud, hardened by just such a process as we employ to make artificial stone? It is a much more plausible explanation of their construction than the laborious and unintelligent suppositions that the stones were carried across the desert to form the foundation and base of the pyramids. I firmly believe that the Egyptians of the ante-Christian era understood the manufacture of artificial stone, and that they built the pyramids out of it.—Philadelphia Press.

Queer Ears.

On the tibia of grasshoppers' and crickets' fore legs may be seen a bright shiny spot, oval in form, which has been found to be a true ear. Old naturalists supposed these strange structures helped in some way to intensify the penetrating, chirping sounds of crickets. No one for a moment thought they might be ears.

Sir John Lubbock and other modern naturalists have decided that crickets, bees, ants, and other little animals shall not keep their sense-organs a secret from us any longer; and although these are often in the least suspected places, still, by careful experiments they are sure to be discovered, as was the cricket's ear. Some grasshoppers have no ears in their legs, and as a rule these cannot sing.—St. Nicholas.

Tobacco smoking is growing rapidly in England. During the last fifty years the consumption per head of population was nearly double.

LITHO-CARBON, A NEW MINERAL.

Claimed by Those Interested That It Is a Perfect Insulator.

Mr. John Weir of New York is at the head of a company which is developing the uses of the new mineral to be known as litho-carbon, recently discovered in Texas. He tells an interesting story about this mineral heretofore unknown to geologists. Mr. Weir asserts that litho-carbon is destined to work a revolution in many important fields of commerce.

"In the first place, I want it understood that I claim nothing for this new mineral except what can be backed up by experiments that have already been made," said he. "Vast layers of this new material have been found in Central and Southwestern Texas. It is of dark brown color and of a spongy or rather clayey consistency. The broad veins in the ground appear to be a mass of sea-shells, held together by sand covered with a dark, sticky film of the color of dark brown sugar. It has no taste and no odor. The veins of the new material range from two to forty feet in depth. In most places it is near the surface of the ground. Samples of this new material were examined at first by a number of chemical experts in New York, and none of them could tell what it was. The new material resisted completely the action of water, heat, acids, and alkalis, and that proved if the secret was once learned the new material would be a startling discovery.

"Finally one chemist applied a bath of common benzine to the new material, and that had the desired effect of separating it into two parts—one the white sand and seashells, the other the new mineral, which was of a brilliant black color and had the consistency of cold molasses.

"Now, as to the uses to which litho-carbon can be applied: "It has been proved that it will make the most perfect insulator yet known. I have a certified statement from Prof. Hamilton, the electrician of the Western Electrical company, saying that under the most exhaustive tests a wire having a covering of this litho-carbon revealed a resistance of over 7,000 megohms per mile. No other wire known shows a resistance of 1,000 megohms per mile. You can take the simple naked wire and soak it in a liquid made from litho-carbon until the wire is merely covered with a film, and it will then stand proof against 600 degrees Fahrenheit, and besides this the thinnest film insures perfect insulation. The litho-carbon may also be used as a paint that will resist the action of heat, salt air, salt or fresh water, or gases of any kind, and can also be used as a varnish with the same result.
